

NICK CARTER WEEKLY

Issued Weekly. By Subscription $2.50 per year. Entered as Second Class Matter at New York Post Office by STREET & SMITH, 238 William St., N. Y.

No. 280.

Price, Five Cents.

IT WAS THUS THAT THE MINISTER MET DEATH.

NICK CARTER WEEKLY

Issued Weekly. By Subscription $2.50 per year. Entered as Second Class Matter at the N. Y. Post Office, by STREET & SMITH, 238 William St., N. Y. Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1902, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, Washington, D. C.

No. 280.

NEW YORK, May 10, 1902.

Price Five Cents.

NICK CARTER STRIKES OIL;

OR,

Uncovering More Than a Murderer.

By the author of "NICHOLAS CARTER."

CHAPTER I.

THE CLERGYMAN.

"It ain't right! it's swindling, and you can't make it anything else!"

These words, uttered in a loud, angry voice, were followed by a fierce oath.

The man to whom they were addressed raised his hand, and there was a look of pain on his pale face.

"I wish you wouldn't swear," he said, gently. "Be calm, and tell me just what you mean."

The first speaker looked ashamed of himself, and probably would have answered in a quiet way if another man who was standing near had not put in:

"Don't pay any attention to him, Mr. Judson. Let him rave. If he's such a fool that he can't make money, it's not your fault, and he has no business to complain to you."

"But," said Mr. Judson, "he makes a serious charge——"

The first speaker did not hear this, for he was angry almost beyond his control, "mad clean through," as the saying is in that part of the country, Colorado, where the scene took place.

He did not hear because he broke in violently:

"I've been swindled, robbed, do you hear? and you're just as much to blame as if you'd been the only one in the scheme. You wear the clothes of a preacher, but, by ——! you're a wolf in sheep's clothing, and you deserve to be shot on the spot. If you want to keep that pious skin of yours whole, you'd better not come around Hank Low's way."

"But, Mr. Low, listen to me," the clergyman begged.

"Not a word, you black-coated devil! When I think of the way my wife and kids have been cheated by a sneak-thief of a minister, it puts murder in my heart, it does! I won't talk to you, for fear I'll forget and take the law into my own hands. Geddap, Jenny."

The man's old mare responded to the command and a lash of the whip and jogged away, dragging the rickety old wagon in which sat the angry Hank Low alone.

The clergyman turned, with a sigh, to his companion.

"I'm afraid, Mr. Claymore," he said, "that all is not as it should be in this matter."

"Pooh!" returned Claymore, easily; "you mustn't mind the howling of such a wild man. He doesn't know what he's talking about. He won't hurt you."

"Oh! that isn't what I fear. I don't like to hear a man talk like that, because it shows that he believes he has been wronged. There might be some truth in it. If so, I should be the first to make it right."

"But there isn't anything wrong. It was all a plain matter of business. Hank Low had a lot of land that he couldn't do anything with. We asked him his price for it, we had a dicker with him, and he sold. What could be simpler, or fairer, than that?"

Instead of answering, the clergyman looked over the ground where they were standing.

It was a level, but rocky, spot between high hills.

No house was in sight, but a half-mile further up the valley was Hank Low's cabin.

Three miles in the other direction was the small village of Mason Creek.

Some miles beyond that the city of Denver.

This spot where they stood had been part of Hank Low's farm.

He had had a hard struggle trying to make a living out of his land, and had not succeeded very well.

There was a heavy mortgage to be lifted, besides.

One day a couple of men came to Mason Creek and spent a good deal of time tramping about the country.

One of them was William Claymore.

After a few days of tramping about, Claymore offered to buy the most useless part of Hank Low's farm.

He mentioned the name of Rev. Elijah Judson as a man who was interested with him in some kind of a plan.

Nothing very definite was said about it, but Low understood that the clergyman meant to put up a private school for young ladies, and wanted the land for that purpose.

A deal was made by which Low was able to pay off his mortgage, but nothing more.

He would have been content with that if he had not discovered when it was too late that the parties who bought his land had no idea of putting up a school or anything of that sort.

It was at the time when the fact was just becoming known that oil could be found in great quantities in the far western lands.

Claymore and his companion, by making secret tests of the soil, had come to the conclusion that this worthless end of Hank Low's farm was the best place in the state for oil wells.

So they bought several acres for next to nothing.

It might be supposed that their next step would be to sink wells and build a refinery, or a pipe line.

But such things cost money, and neither Claymore nor his partner had any left to speak of.

They had to raise it, and in this task they had the assistance of the Rev. Elijah Judson.

The clergyman had not been in Colorado when Hank Low's land was bought.

In fact, he did not half-understand the scheme.

He had not been a success as a preacher, but he had a little money, some two or three thousand dollars, and Claymore had persuaded him that with it he could make his fortune in oil.

There was nothing dishonest in discovering oil and digging for it.

If there had been, the clergyman would not have touched the scheme.

Supposing that it was all right, he had put in his money, and had been made the president of the company.

His name was printed in large type on the letters sent out by Claymore.

These letters were sent to people in the far east who had been members of Rev. Mr. Judson's church.

They were sent to other places where his name was known, and they told all about the wonderful discovery of oil.

Friends of the clergyman were to be allowed to invest in the company if they wanted a sure thing.

The letters did not state that money was needed for digging the wells or building a refinery.

Oh, no! Persons who received the letters were given to understand that this was their chance to get rich quickly.

And the Rev. Elijah Judson's name as president of the oil company was enough to make everybody sure that it was all right.

For, of course, the clergyman would not go into any business that was not perfectly straight and sure.

That was quite the case—at least, the clergyman thought it was. He meant well, and he really believed that the company was square, and that there would be great profits in the business.

There were many answers to the letters, and money came in rapidly. Not many persons invested large amounts, but the sum total was considerable.

All this operation of raising money for the work took several months.

At last the clergyman went to Colorado to look over the plant and do his share of the work.

He was surprised to find that there wasn't any plant.

There was the land that had been bought; on it were a few small mounds of loose dirt to show where borings had been made; and in Denver there was an office of the company.

Nothing more.

Claymore explained that it took time to get the machinery for sinking the wells, and Mr. Judson was satisfied.

They went out to the land, and there happened to meet Hank Low, as he was driving to the city with a small load of farm stuff for the market.

By that time, of course, Low had learned just why his land had been bought.

The farmer honestly believed that he had been swindled, because nobody had told him that the land he was selling was very valuable.

"They might have let me in on the deal," he grumbled. "The land was mine. S'pose it had been gold they found. Wouldn't it be swindling to make me sell it dirt cheap just because I didn't know what 'twas worth?"

His neighbors told him he mustn't expect any better treatment in a business deal.

"But," he argued, "they sprung the preacher on me, made me believe there was to be a school there. Ain't that false pretenses? You bet, 'tis! an' ef ever I git my hands on that preacher I'll make him suffer!"

He hadn't had his hands on the Rev. Elijah Judson, but he had made him suffer just the same.

"I hate to be called a swindler," sighed the clergyman, as he stood there with Claymore.

"Mr. Judson," responded Claymore, "business is business, and the man who gets left in a trade is always sore. That's all there is to it, and you mustn't think anything more about it."

"Well," said Mr. Judson, "I'll try to think it's all right, but if I should find that any wrong has been done I shall insist on making things right with Low."

There was a sneering expression on Claymore's face, but he said nothing, and they returned to the city.

Mr. Judson found new trouble there. He met one of his old church members on the street and shook hands with him.

"I didn't know you were in this part of the country, Mr. Folsom," said the clergyman.

"I suppose not," snapped Mr. Folsom, in reply,

"and I presume you'd have liked it better if I had stayed away."

"Why! what do you mean?"

"I came out here to look into the oil company I put my money in. That's what I mean."

"Well——"

"There isn't any well! There ought to be several, but there isn't one, and, what's more, there won't be any, and what's more yet, you know it."

"Why! brother Folsom——"

"Don't brother me! You've lent your name to a swindle, and you ought to be ashamed of yourself. I can stand my loss, thank God! and it will teach me not to trust a minister again, but there are others, widows and orphans, who have put their all into your infernal scheme, and they can't stand it. You've made them beggars just to fatten yourself."

The clergyman grew ghastly pale as he listened, and even Claymore, who was still with him, looked troubled.

"This is dreadful!" gasped Mr. Judson. "I'd die if I believed it to be half-true!"

"Then you'd better die," retorted Folsom. "That's all I've got to say. I've looked at that wonderful land the company bought, and there isn't enough oil in it to fill a lamp. Not a dollar that's been put into it will ever be got out again. But you'll be fairly well off with the money you've got from the widows and orphans—if you don't get into jail for swindling."

With this Mr. Folsom strode away.

"What does it mean?" asked Mr. Judson.

"Sore head, that's all," responded Claymore. "He doesn't know what he's talking about——"

"But he seems to. Mr. Claymore, if I find that there has been any dishonest work in this business I shall expose it all, understand that. I shall die of the shame of it, but I will not commit suicide until I have seen that the really guilty parties are punished."

"Come, Mr. Judson, don't talk of suicide. That's foolish. You're not used to business, that's all."

"It is not all—ah! there's Mr. Low's wagon in front of that store. I am going to speak to him."

Claymore objected, but the minister was stubborn, and they went into the store.

Low was there, and the clergyman asked him to call at the hotel to talk over matters.

"I want to know all the facts," said Mr. Judson.

"Wal," answered Low, slowly, "I've got some business to attend to, but ef ye're in at half-past three I'll be thar."

"I shall look for you at that hour."

It was then about noon, and while they were at dinner Claymore tried to make the clergyman think that the business was all straight, but evidently he did not succeed.

"I shall go to my room and think quietly till Low comes," said Mr. Judson when they got up from the table, "and I repeat that if all does not seem to be honest and aboveboard I shall take measures to right the wrongs that have been done."

"Go ahead, then," grumbled Claymore. "I shall be at the office if you want any information."

They parted, and did not meet again.

Half-past three came, and, prompt to the minute, Hank Low drove to the hotel entrance and went in.

Mr. Judson's room was on the fourth floor, the clerk told him, and called a boy to show the visitor up.

"Never mind," said Low, "I've been here before, and I know the way."

He therefore went up alone.

Within five minutes he came down the stairs again, an angry look upon his face.

He said nothing to anybody, but hastened to his wagon, got in, said "Geddap, Jenny," and drove away as rapidly as the old nag could take him.

As nearly as anybody could make out, it was just previous to Low's departure that two or three persons on a street that ran along one side of the hotel were fearfully startled by the sight of a man falling from an upper story window.

He struck head first on the sidewalk, and was instantly killed.

Men were at his side before his heart stopped beating, but no word came from the unfortunate man's lips.

He was unknown to those who saw his end, but they knew from the cut of his clothes that he was a clergyman.

Information was taken to the hotel office at once, and the clerk went out.

He immediately identified the body as that of a guest of the house, Rev. Elijah Judson.

CHAPTER II.

WAITING FOR NICK CARTER.

In the first horror of this discovery nobody thought of murder.

It was taken for granted that the unfortunate clergyman had been leaning from his window and lost his balance.

It was not long, however, before men began to look at the thing in another way.

The minister's body was left on the walk under guard of policemen until an undertaker came to take it away.

Up to that time no friend of the dead man had appeared.

The clerk had been so shocked that he could not remember whom he had seen with Mr. Judson.

So the hotel manager had engaged the undertaker.

At last the clerk recalled that Judson had been with Claymore early in the morning, and that the two had dined together in the hotel restaurant at noon.

Accordingly, a messenger was sent to the oil company's office to inform Claymore of what had happened.

It was while the messenger was gone on this errand that a man went into the hotel and laid his card on the clerk's desk.

"Send it up to Mr. Judson, please," he said.

"Mr. Judson!" gasped the clerk, looking first at the man and then at his card.

"Yes," replied the caller, "Rev. Elijah Judson. He's stopping here, isn't he?"

"Yes—that is, he was, Mr.——" The clerk looked at the card. "Mr. Folsom," he added, "but he's—he's gone."

"Gone! when?"

"A short time ago—ah! you see, Mr. Folsom, he's dead!"

"Dead!" cried Folsom, "dead! Mr. Judson dead?"

"Instantly killed, sir."

Mr. Folsom echoed these words as if he were in a dream.

"What do you mean?" he whispered then; "how did it happen?"

"Nobody knows, sir," replied the clerk, "except that he pitched headforemost out of his window. He struck the sidewalk; it was just outside there——"

The clerk's explanation was not heard by Mr. Folsom.

"My God!" he gasped, pressing his hand to his brow; "he took me in earnest and committed suicide."

"Suicide!"

It was the clerk who repeated the word, but he had not time to say more when Claymore rushed breathlessly up.

He had caught the last of Folsom's remark.

"What's that you say of suicide?" he demanded, excitedly.

Folsom looked at him, blankly.

"I said," he answered, slowly, "that my old friend had committed suicide, and I fear it was some hasty, angry words of mine that drove him to it."

Claymore looked sharply at the speaker.

He remembered him.

That conversation on the street was not easy to forget, though Claymore had taken no part in it.

Evidently, Folsom did not remember that he had ever seen Claymore before.

He had spoken to the clergyman without noticing that a stranger stood near.

"I think you're wrong," said Claymore, still looking straight at Folsom.

"I wish I could think so," responded Folsom, sadly; "but I spoke to Judson very harshly. I thought I had reason to be angry, and I guess I had, but I should not have spoken in that way. I came here just now to beg his pardon. He said at the time that he should die, and I told him he'd better. Good God! to think that I should have hounded him to his death!"

Mr. Folsom was terribly distressed.

The crowd that had gathered at the clerk's desk listened breathlessly.

"You may be entirely right," said Claymore, quietly, "but I think not. I heard the conversation you refer to."

"You heard it?"

"Yes; I was with Mr. Judson at the time."

"Ah! I didn't see you. Then you heard his words?"

"I did, and, as I say, you may be right, but I think differently."

"How can you?" asked Mr. Folsom, eagerly; "if there's a ray of hope for a different explanation, in the name of Heaven speak up, man!"

"Mr. Judson had a bitter enemy," said Claymore.

"An enemy? Do you know this?"

"I heard a man threaten to kill him this morning."

For an instant Mr. Folsom was too astonished to speak.

He stood with his mouth open, staring at Claymore.

Then he brought his fist down on the clerk's desk with a bang! and exclaimed:

"Then, I'll be responsible for tracking that enemy to the ends of the earth, if necessary. I'll telegraph for Nick Carter to come. He's in this part of the country, and I can get him here by evening, if not sooner."

There was a murmur from the crowd.

Everybody, unless it was Claymore, seemed to think that this would be the best possible plan.

After a moment, he asked:

"Is Carter a friend of yours?"

"I'm proud to say he is," replied Folsom. "We've been friends since boyhood, and he will do anything for me, I'm sure. I can't rest as long as there's any shadow of doubt that I worried poor Judson to his death."

"The local police on such a plain case," began Claymore, but Folsom interrupted:

"I said I'd take the responsibility, and I will. Let the local police do all they can. It won't do any harm to have Carter also on the spot. I'll wire him at once."

He reached for a pad of telegraph blanks, and wrote a dispatch, which he gave to the clerk with a request that it be sent to the office in a hurry.

A bell boy went off with it on the run.

Then Folsom turned again to Claymore.

"Who is this enemy of Judson's you speak of?" he asked.

A man who had been quietly listening to the conversation touched Claymore on the shoulder.

"Don't answer that question just yet," he said.

At the same time he pulled aside the lapel of his coat.

Claymore and Folsom both saw a badge pinned to his vest.

"Come into the office a minute, both of you," added the stranger.

The two men followed him into the hotel manager's private room, and the door was closed.

"My name is Kerr," the stranger said then. "I am a detective, and belong to the regular force here. I shall be very proud to work with Nick Carter on this case if he comes, but it is my duty to get ahead on it, and clear it up before he arrives, if possible."

"Of course," responded Claymore.

Folsom nodded.

"Now," said Detective Kerr, "you may answer this gentleman's question. Who is the enemy you refer to?"

"You mean the man I heard threaten Mr. Judson's life?" asked Claymore, cautiously.

"Yes."

"It was a farmer named Hank Low. He lives out beyond Mason Creek a few miles."

Kerr made a note of the name.

"What led to the threat?" he asked.

"The men had high words about a business transaction, in which Low thought he'd been badly used. As a matter of fact, Low was treated with perfect fairness."

"But he was hot about it, eh?"

"I should say so!"

"Where was the threat made?"

"Out there."

"Near Mason Creek?"

"Yes; on the oil company's land."

"Well, do you mean to say that this Hank Low followed Mr. Judson to the city for the purpose of murdering him?"

"No, I don't mean to say anything of the kind."

"Then I don't see how we can suspect Low. Mason Creek is some miles away——"

"Yes, but Low was on his way to the city when we saw him."

"Oh! that's different. Now perhaps we are getting down to business. The first question is, did anybody see him in town?"

"I saw his wagon in front of a store," said Claymore, hesitatingly.

"Why do you hesitate?" demanded the detective, sharply.

"Well, I just begin to feel that it's a pretty serious thing to bring a charge of murder against a man. You see, Low was hot and he shot off his mouth in a temper. I presume he didn't mean what he said."

"It isn't our business to think what he meant," declared Kerr. "And we're not bringing any charge against him. If he's innocent he can stand a little inquiry. So you'd better tell all you know frankly and not wait till you're examined in court."

"Oh, I'll be frank enough," said Claymore. "I know that Mr. Judson asked him to call here at half-past three."

"You ought to have said that before."

Folsom, who had been listening quietly to the conversation, here suggested that an investigation should be made to find whether this Hank Low had been seen in the hotel.

"I was just going to," said Kerr.

He opened the door and asked the clerk to step in.

"Do you know anybody named Low?" asked Kerr, when the clerk was with them.

"Yes," replied the clerk; "there's a farmer named Hank Low, from Mason Creek——"

"That's the man."

The clerk said nothing further, and Kerr asked:

"When did you see him last?"

"This afternoon," was the reply.

"Here?"

"Yes—Great Heaven!"

The clerk looked suddenly startled.

"What's the matter?"

"Why! Hank Low called on Mr. Judson just before he died—or was it afterward?"

"That's a mighty important point," said Kerr, gravely. "Isn't there any way by which you can fix the time?"

The clerk thought a moment.

"Yes," he said, "I can fix it to the minute, but I can't do it offhand."

"Why? How can you fix it, then?"

"Just as Low came up to the desk a telegraph boy came with a message for a guest. I had to sign the boy's book."

"Yes. Well?"

"I had to enter the time, you know, and I looked up at the clock as I did so."

"Did you enter the exact minute?"

"I did."

"What was it?"

"That I can't remember."

"The boy's book will show."

"Sure."

"Then," said Kerr, rising, "we'll look up that boy, and also try to find the exact minute at which Mr. Judson fell or was thrown from the window."

The detective cautioned the others to say nothing about their conversation, and went out to talk with the men who had seen Judson fall.

They agreed pretty nearly as to the time of the event.

One said twenty-five minutes of four.

The other thought it was two minutes later.

When their watches were compared it was found that one's was two minutes ahead of the other's.

The testimony of several other persons was taken on this matter, and it was agreed that twenty-five or twenty-six minutes of four was the time when Mr. Judson met his death.

A bell boy was quietly questioned also.

He remembered seeing Hank Low leave the hotel office.

"'Twas just after he had gone up alone," the boy said. "I remember, 'cause the clerk was going to send me up with him, and he saved me a trip up-stairs by going alone."

This was important, and Kerr asked a number of other questions as to how it happened that Low went up alone, and so forth.

Next he found a man who remembered seeing Low drive rapidly away.

This man did not know when he was being questioned that Low was suspected of murder.

"I says 'Hello, Hank,' says I," he told the detective, "and he said, 'Hello,' and got into his wagon."

"How's things at the farm?" says I.

"Can't stop to chin," says he, kind of mad, and he whipped up his critter and went away. Never seen Hank in such a hurry."

All this was important, and Kerr made a note of the names of all witnesses.

"I'll try to show Nick Carter," he thought, "that I can work up a case."

He was just about to leave the hotel when Folsom approached him with a telegram in his hand.

He gave it to Kerr, who read the one word it contained:

"Coming."

It was signed "N. C."

"All right," said Kerr; "when he gets here I shall probably have the guilty man in the lock-up. He doesn't say when he will arrive."

"No," responded Folsom, "but as this was sent from Pueblo, it shows that he is on the way. I've looked up the trains, and should say that he'd be here early in the evening."

"Well, I'm going down to the telegraph office to look up that messenger's book. If it gives the time I think it does, I shall start for Mason Creek without waiting for Carter."

"I suppose that's right," said Folsom.

Kerr was sure it was.

He went to the telegraph office, but was disappointed to learn that the boy who had the book he needed to see had been sent to a distant part of the city, and could not be back before six o'clock at the earliest.

Then Kerr was in doubt as to what he ought to do.

"It would make me look like thirty cents," he reflected, "if I should arrest Hank Low and bring him to the city, only to find that the boy's book showed that he couldn't have done the thing."

"Suppose, for example, the book shows that the clerk signed it at twenty minutes to four."

"By that time Judson had been dead at least five minutes, and, of course, Low couldn't be guilty."

"I think I'll wait for the boy to get back. Carter may be here by that time, and I'd rather take his judgment."

And Kerr left it that way. He went down to the railroad station at a quarter to six with Folsom, hoping to meet the great detective on the train due to arrive from Pueblo at that hour.

CHAPTER III.

A SUSPECT AND AN ALIBI.

They were not disappointed.

Nick was on the train, and Patsy was with him.

They had recently been engaged in a case that took them to the western part of British America. When that was finished Nick had taken in Colorado on the way home, for the purpose of examining some mining property that belonged to a friend, who had asked him to do so.

It was while he was on this business that he had run across Folsom.

Having finished his examination of the mines, and having no other business pressing at the moment when he received Folsom's telegram, he had gone at once to a train and started for Denver.

He greeted Folsom warmly when they met on the platform, and then he was introduced to Kerr.

"I'm glad to see you, Mr. Kerr," said Nick. "I suppose there's no mystery about this case?"

"Well, I don't know," replied Kerr; "I think not, but you may have a different opinion."

"I thought it was all settled."

"Settled, Mr. Carter? What do you mean?"

Nick smiled, and glanced at Folsom.

"Usually," he said, "my friends do not have a brass band to meet me when I begin to work."

Folsom started, and looked uncomfortable.

It was not until that minute that he remembered Nick Carter's great objection to working on a case when it was known that he was at work.

"I beg your pardon, Nick," said Folsom, hastily; "I've been excited this afternoon, or I would have sent for you secretly, but there's no brass band about it. Mr. Kerr is the only one who knows that you are here."

"It's all right, Folsom; don't worry," responded Nick, "but I'll bet the cigars that more than Mr. Kerr know."

"You'd win," said Kerr. "Mr. Folsom spoke of sending for you in the presence of fifty men."

"That's so!" exclaimed Folsom, looking very awkward.

Nick laughed.

"Let it go," he said, good-humoredly. "I don't need to bother with the case if I don't want to. I presume Mr. Kerr has the hang of it, anyway. So, unless there is real trouble, Patsy and I can take the night train for the East."

"I hope you won't, Mr. Carter," said Kerr, earnestly. "I do think that I can put my hand on the murderer, but I'd like very much to get your opinion if not your assistance."

"All right. There'll be time enough for that while we get dinner somewhere. Can you take us to a quiet place?"

"We were going to the hotel where the crime was committed. The Western Union manager is going to send a boy there with a piece of evidence we need just as soon as the boy gets back from a long errand."

"Very well," said Nick; "we'll go to the hotel, but we won't go together, if you please. You and Folsom go back together, and if anybody asks you about Nick Carter, give them any kind of a steer you choose, as long as you make them understand that I'm not in town. Then engage a private room for dinner——"

"We have done that already, Mr. Carter."

"Good! What's the number?"

"Fourteen, second floor."

"Patsy and I will join you there in half-an-hour unless there's some hurry."

"No," said Kerr, a little doubtfully, "I don't believe there's any hurry, for we can't act till we get the messenger boy's evidence."

"So long, then."

Kerr and Folsom left Nick and Patsy inside the station, where they had met.

"You don't really hope to conceal the fact that you're in Denver, do you, Nick?" asked Patsy.

The great detective smiled.

"When fifty men heard that I was sent for?" he returned, quietly; "not quite."

"Then, why do you make such a fuss about it? Why not go along to the hotel openly?"

"Patsy," said Nick, as he pretended to consult a pocket timetable, "if the guilty man was one of that fifty, don't you think it likely that he would shadow Folsom and Kerr and follow them to the station to see if I came?"

"Gee! yes! I hadn't thought of that."

"And if he did so, of course, he's seen me."

"Sure."

"And he wouldn't follow the others out, but would wait to see what became of me."

"That's it."

"Well, then——"

"You needn't say any more, Nick. I'm on. I've spotted every man who has been in sight since we stepped off the train."

"About a dozen of them, eh?"

"Fully that."

All through this talk each had been carefully looking around the station, though no one there could have suspected that they were paying attention to anything but themselves.

In fact, Nick had been taking in the situation from the moment he met Kerr and Folsom.

"Let's go into the waiting-room," he said, as he put away his timetable, "and buy a cigar and a newspaper."

As they went across the large room they observed very carefully to see if any man was watching their movements.

The crime had happened too late in the afternoon for the regular editions of the evening papers, but extras were now out, and a big pile of them had just been brought to the news stand.

Several men were at the counter buying the papers. Patsy went to the cigar case, and Nick asked for a paper.

The boy behind the counter was very busy just then.

Nick had to wait his turn, which didn't trouble him any.

"Mr. Claymore!" the boy called, suddenly; "you forgot your change."

"Oh! did I?" said a man, who had bought several papers and was hurrying away.

He came back and reached his hand across the counter.

"Keep a nickel of it for your honesty," he said.

"Thankee, Mr. Claymore."

Nick bought his paper next, and Patsy joined him.

They went slowly to a corner of the waiting-room and sat down.

"Well?" said Nick, as he unfolded the paper and began to read about the death of Rev. Mr. Judson.

"Well," repeated Patsy, "there's nobody hanging around now who was here when we came."

"I thought so."

Nick read for a moment, and then remarked:

"That's an honest newsboy."

"Yep," returned Patsy, who had heard the talk about the forgotten change.

"The man he spoke to was on the platform when we arrived."

"Yep."

That was all they said about it.

As a matter of fact, neither of them had the slightest suspicion of Claymore, any more than they had of any of the dozen others who had stayed in sight while Kerr and Folsom were there; but they remembered his face and name.

That was a matter of habit with them.

"Look it over," said Nick, passing the paper to Patsy.

While the young man read, Nick thought.

At last he said:

"I think we'll call at the undertaker's."

The name of the undertaker who had taken charge of Judson's body was printed in the paper, and Nick inquired the way to his place from the first policeman they met.

There was a crowd of curious idlers at the door, and a man stood there, who at first was not going to let the detectives in.

"We want to see the body of the clergyman who——" Nick began.

"I know you do!" interrupted the man, crossly, "and so does everybody else, but you can't see?"

"Can't see when I have eyes?" retorted Nick, with a queer smile, and he pushed by the man into the building.

The man was astonished.

He had not expected this stranger to defy him, and there was something so commanding in Nick's quiet way of doing things that he had let both detectives pass before he knew it.

Then he followed them into the office, blustering.

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

"It's my business to be here," said Nick, coldly. "I am a detective, and my name is Nicholas Carter."

"Oh!" exclaimed the undertaker, and his eyes bulged. He did not seem able to take them off the famous man, of whom he had heard so much. "Oh!" he added, after a pause.

"If that makes a difference," said Nick, "you may show us the body."

"Certainly, anything you want, Mr. Carter. Only too proud."

He led the way to a back room, and for a minute or two Nick and Patsy stood there studying the still, cold form.

"Can I do anything more for you?" asked the undertaker, as they turned away.

"No, thank you."

"I suppose you'll see the clergyman's friend, won't you?"

"Do you mean Mr. Folsom?"

"Yes, sir. The hotel people, you see, Mr. Carter, told me to take charge of the body, and I supposed it would be a kind of charity case, as, of course, the hotel people had no interest in the unfortunate man. But if Mr. Folsom was his friend, perhaps he'd like to order a better casket, don't you see. If——"

"I'll speak to Mr. Folsom about it."

"Thank you, sir. Perhaps you'd like to look at some of my caskets and advise Mr. Folsom——"

"I'll leave that to him."

"Oh! very well, sir; but if you don't mind speaking to him about the matter. It would be too bad to bury a clergyman in an ordinary——"

By this time Nick and Patsy were out of hearing.

"Say!" said Patsy, in a tone of disgust, "that fellow had gall."

Nick was silent.

"The idea of asking you to pick out a casket! Huh!"

When they were about half-way to the hotel, Nick remarked:

"It wasn't suicide."

"No," responded Patsy. "I could see that. The thing that killed him was the breaking of the back of his skull on the sidewalk; but he had a black-and-blue mark over the right eye. That wasn't made by his fall."

"Certainly not. It was made by the blow that sent him reeling through the window."

"That information will make your friend Folsom feel better, won't it?"

"I judge so, as his telegram told me that he feared suicide, and hoped that it was murder."

"But," added Nick, "I don't think I shall be in a hurry to ease Folsom's mind. We'll wait till we have heard the whole story before letting him know what we think. It may be handy to give out the report that we believe it a case of suicide."

"I'm on," said Patsy.

They found Kerr and Folsom waiting for them in room fourteen, and they sat down at once to dinner.

While they were eating, Kerr told the whole story as far as he knew it.

Naturally, he mentioned Claymore's name as the witness to Hank Low's threats.

"Who is this Claymore?" asked Nick, as he lighted a cigar at the end of the meal.

"He's a Denver business man," replied Kerr. "I have no acquaintance with him. I believe he hasn't been here more than a year or so."

"Less than a year, I guess," said Folsom.

"Why, do you know him?" asked Nick.

"No," replied Folsom, "except as I have talked with him this afternoon, but I remember now that his name is on the letters sent out by the oil company of which Judson was president. Claymore is the secretary of the concern, I believe."

"But you hadn't met him before?"

"No; and I didn't hear his name till late in the day, and even then I didn't connect him with the company, though I remember wondering a little how he knew so much about poor Judson. You see, I was terribly excited."

"No wonder."

"It worries me a great deal," continued Folsom, "to think that my angry words might have led Judson to suicide. He meant well, I am sure of that, and he was deceived by the rascals as much as the rest of us."

"Hum!" murmured Nick; "seems to me that's setting Claymore out in rather a black light."

"Yes, it is. I hadn't given it much thought, for my attention was taken up with the death of Judson, but I have no doubt that Claymore is crooked. A dishonest promoter, you know. One of these fellows who knows how to swindle and keep on the right side of the law. Don't you think so?"

"Maybe."

Folsom looked as if he wished that Nick would say more, but the detective was silent.

Shortly after this, a waiter came to the room to say that a telegraph messenger wished to see Mr. Kerr.

"Send him up at once!" exclaimed Kerr.

The boy came in with his book.

"Boss said you wanted to see it," said he, laying it on the table, and going out again at once.

Kerr opened the book with great eagerness.

After looking down the columns of names and time marks until he came to the one he wanted, his eyes glowed with delight, and he passed the book to Nick, with his finger on a certain line where the hotel clerk's name was written.

"There!" he cried, triumphantly; "see that?"

Nick looked.

He saw the clerk's name in one column, and against it in another column the figures, "3.31."

"You see!" added Kerr, too excited to wait for Nick's opinion, "Hank Low did it."

"I see," responded Nick, slowly, "that Hank Low could have done it."

The reply disappointed Kerr.

He began to argue, but Nick interrupted.

"Excuse me a moment, gentlemen," he said.

He rose and looked at Patsy.

They withdrew to a corner of the room, and whispered together a moment.

Then Patsy went out.

Nick returned to the table.

"Excuse me," said Nick, again. "I don't mean to interfere with your handling of the case, Mr. Kerr——"

"Oh! bless you!" exclaimed Kerr, "that's what we all want. You do just what you think best, Mr. Carter."

"Thank you. I was going to say that I had forgotten something and sent my assistant out to look after it. Now, as to this time mark, it is very important. I can see that."

"Of course," said Kerr, encouraged by the great detective's tone. "The testimony of the clerk cannot be doubted. Here is the sure testimony that Hank Low started for Judson's room four minutes before the man fell from his window. It is known that Low left the hotel and drove away just before word was brought in that the man had fallen out. See?"

"Yes."

"Then do you think we ought to lose any time before arresting Low?"

"Do you say that he lives some eight miles from here?"

"Yes—about eight."

"If he's running away, he's got a pretty good start."

"All the more reason why we should get after him at once. I declare, I wish I had run out there and hauled him in before you came."

"That might have been a good idea, but I don't believe there's any use in hurrying now."

Neither Kerr nor Folsom could understand Nick's delay.

The fact was he was waiting for Patsy.

He kept them talking for several minutes, and then Patsy returned.

"Speak out," said Nick. "I want these gentlemen to hear what you have to report."

"Well," said Patsy, "Claymore was in his office all the time from one o'clock to ten minutes of four, when a messenger came to tell him of Judson's death."

CHAPTER IV.

NICK'S JOURNEY TO HANK LOW'S.

Kerr and Folsom stared at each other and at Nick. They were no fools.

It was clear enough what Patsy's errand meant.

"Then," said Folsom, in a low voice, "you suspected Claymore?"

"Oh, no, not exactly," Nick replied, "but I thought it would be just as well to make it impossible to suspect him. That was all."

This remark did not convince either of the men.

"You wouldn't have gone to this trouble," said Folsom, "if you hadn't believed that he had a motive for the crime."

"As to motive," replied Nick, "I can only guess, but if Claymore is crooked and Judson was straight, isn't it possible that Judson threatened an exposure, and that Claymore would try to prevent it?"

Kerr nodded.

"That's all right," he said, "but in the face of this evidence," and he tapped the messenger's book.

"It looks very bad for Hank Low," admitted Nick.

"You think that Claymore set Low up to it?" remarked Folsom.

"Do I?" inquired Nick, mildly.

"Well," responded Folsom, "what are we to think?"

"Anything you please. I am willing to take hold of this case, but, as I start under unusual difficulties, I want you to let me go at it in my own way."

"Certainly, Mr. Carter," said Kerr; "but I don't see the difficulties with all this evidence——"

Nick raised his hand.

"You've done first-rate work, Mr. Kerr," he said. "The evidence is sound as far as it goes. But it don't go quite far enough. The difficulties I refer to are the fact that so many men know that I am here, and that the only man who can say that Judson was murdered is dead."

"I see."

It was Kerr who spoke.

Folsom turned pale.

"You think, then," he said, hoarsely, "that it was not a case of murder at all?"

"I didn't say so," responded Nick; "but this I will say, for, as I am in it now pretty deep, there's no use in concealing my thoughts from you two—but you mustn't let it go any further."

"Certainly not, Mr. Carter."

"Well, then, I don't believe that Hank Low did it."

Both Kerr and Folsom stared open-mouthed.

"By thunder!" said Kerr, slowly, "if any man but Nick Carter said that——"

He hesitated.

"You'd say he was a fool," remarked Nick.

Kerr laughed uneasily.

"I am afraid I should," he admitted.

"That's all right," said Nick; "you can think that of me just as well as not, if you want to. Meantime, I'll go out and get acquainted with Hank Low."

"To-night?"

"Now."

"Won't you want help?"

"Oh, no. If I don't come back with him as a voluntary prisoner, Mr. Kerr, I'll help you arrest him in the morning and give you all the credit."

"Credit be hanged, Mr. Carter! I'm not a jealous idiot."

"Glad to hear you say so. You will lie low, then, till you hear from me again?"

"Yes, but if it was any other man——"

"You'd lock him up as a dangerous lunatic. I know. If I'm mistaken, I'll own up frankly. Now, tell me the way to Mason Creek."

Kerr told him and advised him where to get a horse.

"It seems to me," said Nick, "you've described a roundabout way."

"Yes, the road runs along a crooked valley and around the base of a big hill. If it was daylight, I might tell you of a short cut over the hill, but you wouldn't be able to keep to the trail in the dark, to say nothing of the fact that the woods on the hill are not safe just now."

"Not safe?"

"No. There's a scare about panthers out that way."

"Ah! I shall have to keep my revolver handy."

"It will be as well, but, of course, you'll stick to the road?"

"Yes, though you might tell me where the trail strikes off."

"It's about four miles from here. You pass a perfectly bare ledge a hundred yards long at your right, and then come to a stream. Instead of crossing the bridge, you can follow up the stream. In the daytime, it's plain enough, and not a bad ride for a good horse."

"All right."

Nick then gave some private instructions to Patsy, and left them.

He went to the stable that Kerr had spoken of and hired a horse.

It was about eight in the evening when he galloped away, and at that hour it was quite dark.

The road took him quickly out of the city, and he was soon in a wild country where it would have been easy to imagine that there wasn't a town within a hundred miles.

The sky was clear, but the moon had not yet risen. Nick did not ride hard, for he felt in no hurry.

It was somewhat less than half-an-hour after he started when he noticed a long, high ledge at his right.

"Probably the place Kerr spoke of," he thought.

He was glancing up at it, when his horse suddenly leaped violently.

At the same instant there was a flash and a report from the bushes at the other side of the road.

Nick's hat flew from his head.

He felt a wave of heat cross his brow.

It had been singed by a rifle bullet.

His hand caught his revolver, but before it was drawn, another shot came, and the horse staggered.

Nick slipped off quickly.

He ran a few paces and fell.

Then he lay still and watched.

The horse fell in earnest.

He was some two rods from the detective, and, as he did not struggle after he went down, Nick knew that he had been instantly killed.

Not another sound came from the bushes across the road.

"Confound them!" thought Nick, who was not scratched, except for the slight mark on his forehead. "Why don't they come out to make sure of their business?"

It was clearly a case of murder intended, for, if the unseen villains had been robbers they would have crept forward to go through the supposed dead man.

And, of course, it was plain that they knew whom they were firing at.

Nobody would have shot at a stranger like that.

"This," muttered Nick, "is what comes of starting on a case with a brass band at the head of the procession."

He meant by this that he believed the attempt to kill him was connected with the death of Judson.

"It's only too easy to see how it happened," he thought. "Everybody knew I was sent for, and there isn't a doubt that my arrival was spotted."

"Then it was easy to guess that I would go out to look up Hank Low, and, as this is the only way to his place, they were sure of having a shot at me."

Nick listened as he lay there, but could hear no sound of steps on the other side of the road.

The rushing of the stream a little beyond would have drowned ordinary noises so that the would-be murderers could have got away without being noticed.

Apparently, that was what they did, for the detective neither heard nor saw them.

He could only guess whether they believed that their shots had done their work.

While he was waiting the moon rose.

As the sky was perfectly clear the land became almost as light as day.

Nick at last got up cautiously and went to his horse.

The animal had fallen at the side of the road, and so was out of the way of any one passing.

Nick took off the saddle and bridle and hid them in the bushes near.

"I'll pay for the horses," he thought, "but there's no sense in giving the saddle to the first thief who comes along."

He went back to the spot from which the shots had been fired, and lit up the place with his pocket lantern.

If the scoundrels had accidentally dropped anything that could serve as a clue, the detective would have found it.

Nothing was there that could be of any use to him.

He saw traces of footprints on the grass and leaves, but they were too faint to be measured.

Having satisfied himself on this matter, Nick started on foot to finish his journey.

When he came to the stream, he did not cross the bridge, but turned into the trail that Kerr had told him about.

The moon made the path perfectly plain at the start, and Nick took it not only to save the long walk around the base of the hill, but to save time.

For some reasons, he would have liked to go straight back to Denver.

There was no doubt in his mind that his would-be murderers had gone to the city.

If he was there, he might run across them.

But he believed it to be his first business to have a talk with Hank Low and so he went on.

The trail followed along the bank of the stream for some distance, and then crossed it on a bridge of fallen trees.

After that, it was very steep until it reached the summit of the hill.

Although the trees were rather thick, the moonlight came in on the eastern slope sufficiently to make the way clear.

It was different when Nick began to descend upon the other side.

That slope was in shadow, for the moon was not high enough to light it, and more than once he found it difficult to keep on the path.

Once he thought he had lost it, and he was thinking that it would make him feel rather foolish to get lost at night in these woods.

"Better have kept to the road," he muttered, standing still.

There was a very steep descent just before him.

He could see hardly anything, but he felt that the ground was dipping sharply.

At the left there was a ridge of bare rock, and it seemed that the trail led along the under side of it.

"This must be right," he argued to himself. "By daylight a horse would get down here easily enough. It's the right general direction, anyway, and I'll chance it."

Putting his hands on the bare rock at his left to steady himself, he went slowly down.

It was not a high ledge, and he had come, as he thought, about to the bottom, when there was a slight noise behind and almost overhead that startled him.

His revolver was in his hand instantly.

There was a blinding flash not ten feet in front of him and a deafening report.

Swish! went a bullet past his face.

Then there was a blood-curdling scream in the air above, and the detective fell flat under a heavy body.

CHAPTER V.

THE DETECTIVE MAKES AN ARREST.

Nick's breath was knocked out of him, but he was not stunned.

He knew partly what had happened.

It was a wild beast that had borne him to the ground.

Kerr's remarks about the "panther scare" flashed upon his memory.

Evidently, this beast had sprung upon him from the top of the ledge.

He could feel the great limbs quivering, and one of the claws scratched his hand.

All this was in a quarter of a second.

In the next second, Nick had exerted all his giant strength, and rolled the beast over.

He got upon his knees and fired his revolver three times in rapid succession at the huge carcass that he could feel but not see in front of him.

Then a rough, surprised voice interrupted him.

"Good lord! how many of 'em be ye, anyway?"

"Only one, stranger," replied Nick, getting to his feet.

"Gosh! I thought it mought be a regiment by the way ye fired. Got a double-quick action repeater, ain't ye?"

Nick did not reply at once.

The beast was still clawing the ground frantically, and he was not sure that another dose of lead was not necessary.

Then a little flame glowed in the darkness near by.

The man who had spoken to him had struck a match.

He held it first over the dying panther, for such it was, and then remarked, in a satisfied tone:

"Done for. Four times dead, I reckon."

Then he took a step forward and held the match close to Nick's face.

The men looked at each other in silence for a moment.

Nick saw a surprised, honest-looking face—that of a hardy backwoodsman—and he caught a glimpse of the rifle that the man held loosely in the hollow of his arm.

The backwoodsman saw a well-dressed tenderfoot, whose coat was torn by the panther's claw, whose face was grimed with dirt and smeared with blood.

"By golly, stranger," said the backwoodsman, "you're not jest fit to enter a beauty show—not but what ye may be a slick-lookin' chap when yer face is washed."

The detective laughed heartily.

"I reckon, pard," he said, "that you saved my life."

"Reckon I did," returned the other, quietly, "but I come dum close to killin' you to do it."

"I felt your bullet hiss past my face."

"So? Should ha' thought that mought have scared ye to death."

"Oh, no, I'm used to that."

"You don't say!"

"But I'm not used to enemies that spring on a man in the dark without making any noise of warning. That's what the panther did."

"Yes, he'd ha' had ye, sure, ef I hadn't been here to fire."

"It was good luck."

"Wal, I dunno about the luck of it. I was here on purpose. Been a-lookin' fer that critter."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; the pesky varmint has been worryin' the life out of us, and to-night I jest made up my mind that I'd get him. I was pretty dum certain he'd be on the trail somewhere, fer there's enough as comes over it, you know, to give the scent. I thought he'd be watchin' fer prey, but I didn't have no idee that he'd git a chance at any. That's whar I'm s'prised. How come ye here, stranger?"

"I'll tell you in a minute," Nick answered; "just explain to me first how you managed to take that shot in time. I heard the beast springing just as you fired."

"Why!" said the backwoodsman, "I was waitin' here, hopin' the scent of me would bring the varmint along, and, of course, I wasn't makin' no noise about it."

"Then I heard steps—your'n, you know—and I was wondering about it as you come down the steep part of the trail."

"Ef you look up at the top of the ledge thar you'll see that the risin' moon makes the top line quite clear."

"Wal, I had my gun up, fer I didn't know but what you might be an enemy, when, all of a sudden, I saw a black mass on the clear edge of the rock up thar."

"I knowed what it was, and the thing jumped."

"Thar wasn't no time to think about it."

"I knowed the critter had spied you and was springin' fer ye, and I had to fire then, or not at all."

"So I blazed while the beast was in the air."

"It was too late to save you from a knock down, but the critter was dead when he hit you. Them shots of yours was mighty slick ones, comin' as fast as they did, just as ef you was out practicin' at a target, but they was good powder and lead throwed away."

"I can spare the powder and lead," Nick responded, "and at the time I couldn't believe that the panther had been hit in the heart. He was making a furious struggle."

"Yes," drawled the backwoodsman, "it takes them critters some time to die. But how'd you come here?"

"I was going along the road on horseback when the animal died suddenly."

"Died!"

"Shot."

"Gosh!"

"It was meant for me."

"Huh! Robbers?"

"Perhaps, but they let me alone."

"Mebbe they knowed you was handy with a gun?"

"I shouldn't wonder. Anyhow, I had business out this way, so I came along. I took the trail to save time."

"So! Business out here, you say."

"Yes. I'm looking for Hank Low's place. I presume it's not much further, is it?"

"Hank Low's! No, it ain't much further—'bout two gunshots."

There was surprise and suspicion in the man's tone.

"This trail will bring me there, I suppose," said Nick.

"'Twill if ye follow it far enough."

"Then I shall have to go on. I'm much obliged——"

"Hold on, stranger! What's yer business with Hank Low?"

"I'll tell that to Low."

"Then you can tell it to me."

"Why, are you——"

"Yes, I am. My name's Hank Low."

Nick had guessed as much.

He held out his hand in the darkness and grasped that of the man who had saved his life.

Low returned the grasp rather feebly.

"Mr. Low," said Nick, "I am more obliged to you than ever."

"What do you want of me?" demanded Low, in a surly tone.

"I want to talk to you about the land you sold some months ago."

"Do you belong to the company that bought it?"

The question came quickly, and Low's voice was harsh.

There was no longer the good-natured tone in which he had spoken while talking about the panther.

"No," replied Nick, "I haven't anything to do with the company. I heard you were swindled."

"That was it, stranger!" cried Low; "nothing short of it. People say I was beat in a business deal, but I'm tellin' ye it wasn't a squar' deal."

"I'd like to know all about it."

"What's yer name?"

"Nicholas."

"Be you a lawyer?"

"Not exactly, but I may be able to set you right in some ways that you may not have thought of."

"Wal, Mr. Nicholas, come down to the house. I've got nothin' to hold back, and ef you're interested, you can hear the whole story."

Low talked as they walked along through the woods.

His voice continued to be harsh, as he told of the trick that had been played upon him, but Nick saw that Claymore had kept well within the law.

"It wasn't fair," thought the detective; "but it was what would be called a business deal, and Low was beaten. No wonder he feels sore, but he can't do anything about it."

Of course, Low mentioned the Rev. Elijah Judson in the course of his story.

His voice was more angry at this point.

"I can't understand an out-an'-out villain," said he, "but it seems a durned sight worse when a preacher takes to swindling, now don't it, Mr. Nicholas?"

"I should say so," replied Nick, "if I was sure that the preacher had known that the scheme was unfair."

"Know! How could he help it? Ain't he president of the company?"

"He was."

"Was? Ef he ain't now, then thar's been a mighty sudden change. Will ye come into the house, Mr. Nicholas?"

They had come to cleared land at the bottom of the hill, and Low's house was plainly seen in the moonlight a few rods away.

None of the windows were lighted.

"No," said Nick; "your wife and children are asleep by this time, and we might wake them up. We can talk out here just as well, can't we?"

"Sure."

They sat down on a log near a shallow brook that crossed the farm.

The moon rays reflected from the water straight into Nick's eyes, and his attention was curiously attracted.

"Must be handy having running water on your place," he remarked.

"Huh!" returned Low, "that's whar you reckon wrong. I thought so when I took this land, and I found out my mistake too late."

"What's the matter?"

"Durned ef I know. The cattle won't drink it, and I don't like the taste myself. I've had to dig a well up on the hill thar and run the water to my house and barn through pipes. That cost a good bit, but it was the only way I could get water that would do."

They were silent for a moment. Then Low said:

"I seen that cuss, Judson, to-day."

"So?"

"Yes. He was up here with Claymore in the early morning. I met 'em and we had a jawin' match. I spoke pretty hot, I reckon, but I can't help it when I think how I've been used. Thar's my wife and children, you see. I never have been able to give them the nice things I'd like to. Ef they had let me in on the deal I mought ha' got money enough to dress my children right smart and send them to school in the city."

"What should you say," suggested Nick, "if you heard that the company had got left in buying your land."

"Eh? Got left? What do you mean?"

"Suppose that after all the land proves to be as worthless as you thought?"

"By ——! 'twould serve 'em right."

"I guess that's the case."

"Wal, I'm dum glad to hear it, but it don't make me feel any better toward those swindlers. I kind o' thought the preacher chap wanted to squar' things, but I found I was mistaken."

"So? How was that?"

"He met me again in the city, and asked me to call on him at the hotel. Reckon he had some new, slick scheme up his sleeve."

"Did you call on him?"

"Yep."

"Well?"

"He wouldn't see me."

"That's odd."

"I thought so at the time. I told him I'd be there at half-past three, and he said he'd wait for me. I was there on time, and I went right up to his room."

"What did he say?"

"Say? He didn't say nothin'. I didn't see him. He wouldn't let me in."

"Did he know you were there?"

"Sure! I knocked, and heard somebody stirrin' in the room. I'm sure of that. So, when he didn't say 'Come in,' I knocked again. 'It's Hank Low,' says I, loud and sharp. 'Ef you want to see me, speak up quick, fer I ain't got any time to waste on ye.'

"Thar wa'n't no answer to that, so I sung out that he might go to the devil, and I waltzed downstairs fast.

"I was kind o' 'fraid he might call me back, and I didn't want to hear him, for I was as mad as a hornet, and I was afraid that ef him and me got together thar'd be trouble."

"Did you leave the hotel at once?"

"Yep. Druv straight home and didn't see him then, nor since."

"Did you notice any excitement around the hotel as you drove away?"

"Excitement? Reckon not. A feller I know spoke to me, but I was too dum mad to answer him decent."

"But didn't you notice anything else?"

Low thought a moment.

"Now, I think of it," he said, "I do remember seein' two or three men runnin' down the street at the side of the hotel, but I was so dum mad that I didn't turn my head. The hull town mought ha' been on fire fer all I cared. I was thinkin' of how I'd been cheated."

"I understand."

If Nick had had any doubt of this man's innocence it was all gone now.

Low was no actor; just a plain, honest farmer—bull-headed, quick-tempered and unreasonable, perhaps, but no murderer.

He couldn't have told his story of the afternoon in that straightforward way, if he had been guilty.

"Mr. Low," said Nick, after a pause, "Judson is dead."

"Dead!" repeated the farmer, in a tone that showed the greatest surprise. "How long since, Mr. Nicholas?"

"He died while you were at the door to his room."

"You don't meant it!"

"He was murdered."

"Wha-a-a-t!"

"Thrown from his window to the sidewalk."

"Good lord! Then that was what those men were runnin' for."

"Yes—they went to pick him up."

The farmer sat with his elbows on his knees, staring open-mouthed at Nick.

"That's awful, ain't it?" he whispered.

"It is," said Nick, "and there's something else that is still more awful."

He paused, but Low said nothing.

"It is perfectly well known," Nick added, "that you started up to Judson's room just before the deed."

Low became very attentive, but it was plain that the truth was not dawning on him yet.

"And that you came down again in a hurry," added the detective, "immediately afterward. It is also well known that you threatened Mr. Judson——"

This was enough.

The light burst upon the honest farmer suddenly.

In the moonlight his face was ghastly white, and his voice almost choked, as he said:

"Mr. Nicholas, you don't mean to set thar an' tell me thar's folks as say I done it?"

"That is what they say," returned Nick, quietly.

Low groaned, and buried his face in his hands.

"My wife has often told me," he sobbed, "that that sharp tongue of mine would git me into trouble. I see! It all fits in like the handle into an ax. My God! will anybody believe me?"

"Listen," said Nick. "There isn't going to be as much trouble as you think for. I told you that I was not a lawyer, but that I might be able to help you. I am a detective, Mr. Low."

The farmer uncovered his face and looked frightened now.

"I said my name was Nicholas," the detective went on, "and that was the truth, but only a part of it. My last name is Carter."

Low started.

"From New York?" he gasped.

"Yes."

The farmer shook from head to toes. He laid his trembling hands on Nick's arm, and began:

"Mr. Carter, I've hearn tell of you that you're keen and hard when it comes to criminals, but you're straight with innocent men. Afore God I swear——"

"You don't need to," interrupted Nick; "you are as innocent as I am, and I know it. I believed it when I started out to see you, but I am going to arrest you for murder, nevertheless."

"Mr. Carter! I don't understand! What will my poor wife say?"

"You needn't let her know. I want you to understand, though. Suspicion has been put on you by an enemy of yours. Now, if I lock you up over night, it will make this enemy believe that I have finished my work. See?"

"You want to blind him?"

"Yes. Then I can hunt for the real murderer in my own way."

"All right, Mr. Carter."

Low was perfectly quiet. He did not talk or act like the hot-tempered man who had threatened Mr. Judson.

"You can tell your wife," said Nick, "that a man wants you to go to the city on business about the land deal. Let her think that some good luck has come your way. I don't think you'll have to disappoint her afterward. Then hitch up your horse, and we'll go back together."

Low agreed to this without argument. He went into the house and was gone several minutes. Then he went to the barn and hitched up. A little later, he and the detective were jogging over the road toward Denver.

CHAPTER VI.

THE PHOTOGRAPHER'S EVIDENCE.

Kerr was at police headquarters when Nick arrived with his prisoner.

His eyes glowed triumphantly when he saw them come in.

"You got him!" he exclaimed.

"Yes," said Nick, "he surrendered when I told him how strong the evidence was against him."

"I wonder he hadn't run away."

"Well, you see, he didn't know that a messenger had come in with a telegram just ahead of him."

Kerr chuckled.

"This will be a great story for the newspaper fellows," he said. "They've been here all the evening till about half-an-hour ago. I told them to come back later."

Nick looked thoughtful.

He wondered if it would be necessary to give the honest farmer the shame of having it printed that he had been arrested for murder?

"I suppose the newspaper boys know that I am on the case," said Nick.

"Oh, yes—everybody knows it."

"But they don't know that I went to Mason Creek?"

"Well, I reckon they've guessed it. Newspaper reporters are good at that, you know."

"Do they know that Low was under suspicion?"

"Sure! They got that from the hotel clerk."

"Humph!"

Nick was a little disgusted.

When he handled a case in his own way, hotel clerks and others were not allowed to tell what they knew, and he took pains that nobody should know too much, anyway, until he got ready to tell them.

"See here, Kerr," he said, earnestly, "I'd hold the reporters off for a time, if I were in your place."

Kerr glanced at the clock.

It was not far from midnight.

"They'll be hungry for news pretty soon," said he.

"And perhaps I can give them a little more, and a better story, if they wait a bit."

"Why——"

"Low isn't the only one."

"Ah!"

"I want to consult with my assistant before telling about this arrest."

"You have a clew that you haven't spoken of, then?"

"Maybe. Just lock Low up without putting anything on the blotter for a little while. Give me an hour to see what I can do."

"All right, Carter, if you say so. But what shall I tell the reporters?"

"Nothing. I'll be back inside an hour."

Nick whispered a few words to Low, telling him to keep his courage up and his mouth shut, and went away.

He had asked Kerr to wait an hour, without any idea as to what he should or could do.

Nick felt that he had only got to the beginning of the case.

He was certain of Low's innocence, though he might not be able to convince a jury of it.

It was necessary, then, to find the proof of Low's innocence, as well as proof that somebody else was guilty.

Who that somebody else was he could not guess.

He still thought of Claymore, in spite of the alibi that Patsy had found to be sound.

Claymore evidently had not committed the murder, but that he knew more than he had told, Nick was certain.

Could any evidence be got in an hour that would save Low from being published in the papers as a suspected murderer?

Low's horse and wagon were at the door of the station.

Nick got in and drove to the stable where he had hired a horse.

There he explained what had happened to the horse, paid the damage, and returned the saddle and bridle that he had picked up on the way back with his prisoner.

Then he went to the hotel in the hope of finding Patsy.

He made the round of the rooms on the ground floor without finding him.

As he was passing the desk, the clerk spoke to him.

"Excuse me," said he, "but aren't you Mr. Carter?"

"I am," said Nick.

"There's a young man waiting here to see you. Your assistant told me to point him out to you as soon as you came in."

"Where is he?"

"That man sitting near the door with a parcel in his hands."

Nick went up to the young man.

"Are you waiting for Mr. Carter?" he asked.

"Yes," replied the young man, rising.

"I am he."

"Oh! well, sir, I understand you are working on the Judson matter. The man who is supposed to have committed suicide."

"I have been looking into it a little."

"Well, sir, I've got something here to show you. I showed it to your assistant, and he said it would interest you."

The young man went to undoing his parcel, and three or four idlers drew near.

"Wait," said Nick.

He led the young man to the desk and asked for a room.

Shortly afterward, they were in a room alone, and Nick took the parcel.

Unfolding the paper with which it was wrapped, he found a photograph.

It was a clean-cut picture of Rev. Mr. Judson's fall from the hotel window.

Nick looked earnestly at the picture.

"How did you happen to get this?" he asked.

"I am an amateur photographer," was the reply. "I work in the office at the top of the building just across the street from the hotel. Yesterday I got hold of some new plates that a friend had advised me to use, but I had no time to try them till this afternoon."

"And you tried them on this scene?" asked Nick, quickly.

"Without meaning to, yes. You see, I knew it would be Sunday before I would have time to take any pictures that I cared about, but I wanted to be sure that the plates were all right.

"So, when there was a dull time in the office work, I got out my camera, which I had with me, and went to the window.

"There isn't much of a view from here, but I thought I'd take a couple of shots at the roofs, just to test the plates.

"I had the camera all ready, when I accidentally touched the button.

"That made me hot, for I had spoiled a plate.

"So I pointed it carefully from the best view I could get from there, and tried again.

"Just as I pushed the button, I heard cries on the street, and, looking down, saw a man lying on the sidewalk, and several others running toward him.

"Of course, I went down to see what was the matter.

"It was Mr. Judson.

"Later I went back, and as soon as possible after supper, while there was yet sunlight, I developed my second plate.

"I didn't bring that with me, for it wouldn't interest you. But it came out so good that I thought I might as well see what I had caught on the first plate, when the thing went off before I knew.

"That picture in your hand was what I caught."

He paused, but Nick said nothing, and the young man added:

"I had heard your name mentioned in connection with the matter, and, as people said it was a case of suicide, I thought I ought to show you what I had caught."

Nick drew a long breath.

"Well!" he said, "for once the brass band has been useful. I wanted to work unknown, but the fact that I am known to be on the case has brought me a piece of evidence that otherwise I might never have discovered."

Again he looked at the picture.

"This lets Low out of it," he murmured.

Kerr's theory was that Low had made a mad rush for the clergyman as soon as he entered the room, pushed him from the window, and then hurried out and down the stairs.

The amateur's photograph showed not only the unfortunate clergyman falling headforemost toward the sidewalk, but above him the forms of two men at the window.

They were not looking out, but rather in the act of dodging back.

These two were outlined very dimly, but the picture was clear enough to show that there were two of them, and that their arms were half-raised, as would be natural if they had just thrown a body away from them.

Unluckily, the faces were not at all distinct.

Try as he would, and Nick used his magnifying glass, he could not make them out to his satisfaction.

While he was still studying it, there came a knock at the door, and Patsy hurried in.

"The clerk told me you were here?" he said. "Well?"

"It's a good piece of evidence," responded Nick; "if only this young man had had a little more luck! We could get along without the picture of Judson, if we only had a clean-cut picture of the two murderers."

"That's all right," said Patsy, confidently, "I know who they are."

Nick looked quickly at his assistant.

Then he turned to the photographer.

"Will you leave this with us?" he asked. "I shall see that you are well paid for it."

"Oh! I don't care for any pay," replied the young man. "I shall be glad if it helps you. Good-night?"

He left them, and Patsy made his report.

"I laid for Claymore, as you told me," he said, "and after chasing him around town for a while I found at last that he had gone to the office of the oil company. He spent the whole evening there."

"Was his partner with him?"

"No; but I learned his name."

"What was it?"

"George Donnelson."

"All right. Go ahead."

"There was nothing for me to do but hang around. I was pretty sure that any attempt to find out what Claymore was doing would make him suspicious. So I didn't go into the building even, but stayed outside on the other side of the street.

"It was a dull wait till a little while ago.

"Then something happened.

"A man came hurrying up the street and another man after him. I thought I had seen them both before somewhere, from their motions, but I couldn't see their faces in the dark. I suppose I wouldn't have bothered to get a closer look, if they hadn't stopped right in the entrance to the building where Claymore has his office.

"That interested me, and I crossed over.

"One man was holding the other back.

"'Tain't safe to wait any longer,' said the one who got there first.

"'And it ain't half so safe to try to see him here,' the other answered. 'Don't be a fool! You see, his windows are still lighted, and he's busy. When he gets through, he'll come, as he said he would. Let him alone now and come back.'

"They jawed a little more back and forth, and finally the second man got the first one to go away.

"I didn't know then what they were talking about, and I don't know now, but I dropped Claymore for a time and followed those two men."

"Why?" asked Nick.

"Because I knew them. One was Jack Hamilton, the leader of the gang we had a tussle with in Helena, and the other was his right-hand man, Jack Thompson."

CHAPTER VII.

DADDY DREW'S DIVE.

Nick looked suddenly at the picture.

"By jove!" he muttered, "I believe I know them now."

"I haven't a doubt of it," said Patsy, "but you couldn't swear to it to the satisfaction of a jury."

"True, and the jurymen could look at the picture for themselves, and see that the likenesses are not there. We've got to get more evidence than this, Patsy. Nobody saw them do the deed. This picture almost tells the story, but not quite. But go on. You must have more to tell."

"A little. I shadowed Hamilton and Thompson to a dive where you and I have been before—Daddy Drew's."

"Whew!" whistled Nick. "It means a fight with all the crooks in Denver, if we go there."

"Well, that's where they are, and they're waiting for Claymore."

"All right. We'll go there and get them, then, if we decide we'd better arrest them. Is that all?"

"Not quite. Knowing they were there to stay, I ran back to Claymore's office. He had just put out his lights and was leaving the building."

"He went to police headquarters."

"Did you go in, too?"

"With a disguise, yes. I saw that Claymore had a private talk with Kerr. Then he went out again."

"How did he look?"

"Rocky, but he was saying, 'Very good,' and 'Quite right' to Kerr."

"That means that Kerr told him," said Nick.

"Told him what?" asked Patsy.

"What I have done. He shouldn't have said a word, but I can understand how he should make such a slip, for Claymore was the first to direct suspicion at Hank Low. What became of Claymore?"

"He went home. He lives in a boarding-house——"

"We must have him! Come on!"

They left the hotel together hurriedly.

* * * * *

In a corner of Daddy Drew's dive—the worst place in Denver—sat the two men who had escaped from Nick Carter in Helena a short time before.

They had liquor in front of them, but they drank little.

Every time the door opened to admit a newcomer, they looked that way eagerly.

The place was pretty well filled.

All the scum of the city seemed to drift in there, for it was known that once inside the doors a man need not leave until morning.

Daddy let his customers sleep on the floor, if they had nowhere else to go.

At last it was closing hour.

The doors were locked, and the curtains pulled tightly across the windows.

Jack Thompson muttered an oath.

"He's going to bilk us," he muttered.

"Not him," responded Hamilton. "Wait, I tell you. The night's young yet. He can't afford to bilk us, don't you see?"

"No, I don't. He might skip——"

"But he's not suspected! He's got every reason to stay, for here is where the money is. He'll get around before the night is over."

"I hope he brings his wad with him."

"He will."

They were silent for a moment, and then Jack muttered:

"I'd have liked it better if he'd paid us for the other job and not asked us to tackle the detective."

"Pooh! what scares you so?"

"Nick Carter. Ain't that enough?"

"Nick Carter's dead."

"Do you believe it, Nat?"

"I'm going to tell Claymore so."

Jack shuddered.

"I see you don't believe it," he said; "but I hope Claymore comes along and believes it. Then he'll pay us, and we can skip before the cuss comes to life."

Nat Hamilton smiled.

"He won't come to life if he's dead," he remarked, coolly, "any more than the preacher chap will."

"Ugh!" grunted Jack, and they were silent again.

Not less than thirty men were in the place.

They were fairly quiet, for they knew that loud noise might bring the police down on the dive, and then their night's shelter would be closed up.

But they were a tough lot, and every man of them would have joined in to help anybody there if a policeman, or a dozen of them, had come in to make an arrest.

This was so well known that the police usually waited for their men to come out before trying to arrest them.

There hadn't been a murder in Daddy Drew's for a long time, and a tough present on this night remarked to another that one was about due.

A few minutes after twelve, there was a light knock at the door.

The bartender who went to it and looked through a slide, came back to Nat.

"Feller out there askin' fer youse," he said.

Both men got up, but Nat pushed Jack back into his chair.

"I'll see who 'tis," he said.

He went to the door and looked through the slide.

Claymore's face appeared there as if it were a picture in a frame.

"He's all right," said Nat to the bartender; "friend o' mine. Let him in."

The door was opened, and Nat's friend came in.

As he went to the back of the room silently with Nat, many curious glances were cast at him.

"Who is he?" asked one of another.

And those who answered came pretty near to guessing the truth.

"Some fellow," said they, "who gets others to do his work for him."

Two or three knew Claymore by sight, and they were not surprised.

"Well?" said the newcomer, when he sat down at the table in the corner, and three heads were put close together.

"We done it," said Nat.

"Sure?"

"He's dead as a nail."

There was a short pause. Then, in a low voice:

"You lie, Nat."

Both the criminals started angrily, but they gritted their teeth and looked at the man, who added:

"He's just as alive as I am. Less than an hour ago he brought Hank Low in on a charge of murder."

"Then," exclaimed Jack; "it's all right, ain't it?"

"No! it isn't all right. Carter believes that Low is innocent, and he has arrested him for a bluff. He knows that you did it."

Jack turned ghastly pale.

Nat looked as if he didn't believe it.

"He can't have any evidence against us," said he.

"He'll get it. You know Nick Carter."

"But how can he get it? Nobody saw us."

"Somebody must have seen you enter the hotel."

"No," said Nat, positively; "I swear, Claymore, we got in without being seen."

"You haven't told me how you managed that."

"No, for you sent us down the road on the chance of a pot shot at the detective. I'll tell you. There's an office building next to the hotel, you know, with an alley between."

"Yes."

"We went in there and found an empty room. It was easy enough to pick the lock and get in. Then we found that a short board would reach from the window to an open window in the hotel. Jack went out and swiped a board from the place where they're putting up a new building. At twenty-five minutes past three we put the board out, crawled across and got to the preacher's room without meeting anybody."

"And left the board there?"

"Not on your life!" replied Nat. "We took the board in and hid it in a closet until we had tumbled the preacher out of the window. Then we slipped back, returned to the office building by the same way, and so went down to the street."

"And left the board——"

"Of course! We weren't going to lug it around in daylight. What harm could it do in an empty room?"

"Oh! no harm, of course," very sarcastically. "Nobody would find it, and wonder about it; oh, no!"

"What do you mean, Claymore?"

"I mean this: Nick Carter has that infernally sharp Patsy along with him. I believe you know Patsy."

"Yes, d—— him!"

"So I say! but while Nick went out to get Low, Patsy was nosing around town. He probably found that board; he probably saw you two fellows, and knew you; then he put two and two together, and the long and short of it is that Carter is after you."

"We'll be hanged sure!" groaned Jack.

"There's only one way out of it, boys."

"Well?"

"Carter will come here to a dead certainty. He knows the town, and knows that this is the place where you would most likely hang out. He'll come here."

"Then he'll get a warm time of it," said Nat.

"If you think so, stay. But you know the Carters. If you want a chance to escape, take it now. There's a train for San Francisco runs through here in half an hour. You can catch it."

"Come on," said Jack, rising.

"Hold on a bit," said Nat. "Who pays the freight? We haven't had our money yet."

"I've got it, but I'll be hanged myself if I pay you in here. Get out on the street. I'll go with you part way to the station, and settle with you."

"Don't wait," urged Jack.

"That's good advice. Carter may break in here any minute, or he may sneak in in disguise. That's his most likely way, and then you'll be nabbed before you know it."

Nat was rather pale now.

"I'll give him a fight for it, if he comes," he muttered, but he got up, and the three went out.

When they were on the street Nat turned.

"Will you settle now?" he asked.

"Don't be in such a hurry," was the sharp reply. "Your only safety is to get away from this place. Walk along toward the railroad. I'll be close at your heels until I think it's safe to stop and settle."

Nat hesitated.

"Don't you dare to do us dirt!" he hissed, savagely.

"I'll settle with you both before you get to the station. Get a move on! Carter may be here the next second."

The crooks started away, looking back frequently to see that Claymore was following.

He kept about half-a-block behind them.

Nobody but themselves seemed to be on the streets.

There was a drunken man staggering along some distance ahead, but he didn't count."

He, too, disappeared around a corner before the crooks came to it.

When they were about to pass that corner a quiet voice behind them said:

"This will do. We'll settle here."

"All right," responded Nat.

Both men halted and turned about.

They looked into the muzzles of two revolvers.

The face back of the hands that held the weapons was not that of their employer, Claymore, but that of their deadly enemy, Nick Carter.

CHAPTER VIII.

HANK LOW'S LUCK.

Claymore was not in his boarding-house when Nick and Patsy arrived there.

He had come in and gone out shortly afterward.

Where he had gone, or in what direction, nobody could say.

Possibly to Daddy Drew's to meet the desperadoes he had hired to commit murder; but Nick didn't believe it.

"That long work in his office this evening means something else," said Nick. "He's got another plot up his sleeve. I'll go to Daddy Drew's and get those men."

Accordingly, he had turned his face into a copy of Claymore's and had been admitted easily.

Nat had said he would put up a stiff fight if he should meet Carter, and he kept his word.

Probably he reckoned that the detective would wish to take him alive, for he did not surrender when he saw the revolver pointed at his heart.

Instead he made a quick rush at Nick, trying to knock up both his arms.

The detective was quite ready for that.

It was true that he wished to take the men alive, and he did not fire.

He had hoped they would be scared into quiet surrender.

When the attack came he dropped both weapons to the sidewalk.

Letting drive with his fists, he caught Nat on the chest, and knocked the wind out of him.

But the crook did not fall.

He staggered against Jack, who at first was going to give up.

Seeing that the weapons had been dropped, Jack joined in and made a desperate effort for freedom.

He caught his partner and kept him from falling.

Then both together sailed into the detective.

"Why!" said Nick, with a laugh, "come on, if that's what you want."

His arms shot out like lightning flashes, and every blow landed, but the crooks kept too close for him to give them settlers.

And, after a moment, Jack retreated and drew his revolver.

That was a moment of peril for Nick, as he was busy just then with Nat.

And Nat, seeing the chance, pretended to be knocked down.

This was to give Jack a chance to shoot.

Up came the ruffian's revolver, but before he could aim, around the corner rushed the drunken man whom they had seen.

This man threw his arms about Jack's neck, and bore him silently to the ground.

"Put the bracelets on him, Patsy," called Nick.

"They're on," replied the "drunken man," calmly.

Nick had leaped upon Nat, and in a second had him ironed.

"This is the way I settle," he said, as he stood up.

The prisoners cursed furiously, but if that did them any good nobody knew it.

Nick picked up his revolvers, and then he and Patsy marched the prisoners to headquarters.

Kerr was still there, and he was surrounded by eager reporters.

"Here are the murderers," said Nick. "Low is innocent."

He produced the amateur's photograph, and told the story as briefly as possible.

"The chief villain is yet to be caught," he concluded. "I think we shall find the clew to him in his office."

There was a great deal of excitement at headquarters, and many questions were asked.

Nick told the reporters to make it plain that Low's arrest had been a fake.

"When it's all settled," he said, "I'll give you the details, or you can get them from Kerr, who deserves a great deal of credit for the way he picked up evidence. I've got work ahead between now and morning."

Low was released, of course, and he went with Nick, Patsy and Kerr to Claymore's office.

Everything seemed to be in order there, but Nick picked the lock of Claymore's desk, and found a lot of papers there, on which the man had been at work during the long evening.

There were maps of the country around Mason Creek, some printed, some roughly drawn with a pencil.

There was also the deed which Low had given to the oil company when he sold a piece of his land.

Using his magnifying-glass, Nick saw that some changes had been made in the deed.

Words and figures had been carefully scratched out and others inked in.

"I had an idea this was what he was up to," said Nick. "We shall find Claymore out at Low's farm."

The four men set out for Mason Creek soon after.

Nick went in Low's wagon, and Patsy and Kerr in one they hired.

When they came to the beginning of the trail, Nick got down and told the others to drive slowly on.

"I'll take the short cut," said he. "You keep on by the road, and if he escapes me he'll run into your hands."

As it was late in the spring, light came early.

The day was beginning to break when Nick passed the dead body of the panther.

As he approached nearer Low's house he moved cautiously.

Coming to the edge of the cleared land, he saw a man busy with a shovel at a little distance.

It was Claymore.

He was digging a hole for the purpose of setting a boundary post in it.

The post had been taken up from a spot some distance further down the stream that crossed the farm.

Claymore's scheme was to change the boundaries of the land bought by the oil company so that they should include twice as much as had been bought.

That was why the deed had been changed, and it explained the maps in Claymore's desk.

Nick watched the rascal for a few minutes, and then walked toward him.

"Why don't you put the post up where it will take in Hank Low's house and barn?" he asked.

Claymore turned at the sound, and caught up a revolver that was lying on the ground beside him.

He fired hastily, and the bullet went wild.

Nick had him covered.

"Try again," said the detective, "if you think you can do your own murdering."

As he spoke, he was advancing upon the man.

Claymore gave one desperate look around.

He saw two wagons coming up the road.

Then he dropped his weapon, sat down on the ground, and put his hands to his face.

"You haven't as much nerve as I thought you had," remarked Nick.

He put handcuffs on the prisoner, and waited for the others to come up.

"I can tell you all about it," said Nick, then. "This man Claymore found that he had bought land where the oil was scarce. He was so anxious to get the land cheap that he didn't dare to prospect thoroughly. If he had done his work well, he would have seen that the place for oil wells is further up the stream and nearer Low's house.

"He found that out after a while, and then schemed to get possession of the rest of the farm without paying for it.

"Seeing that Judson would expose the crooked work of the company, he had him murdered by a couple of desperadoes who drifted into Denver just in time for the job.

"Then he did some forgery work on the deed to make it show that he had bought a good many acres more than he really had, and to back up the deed he had to come out here and change the boundary posts.

"His best chance for doing that was while Low was locked up.

"That was why he didn't go to meet his confederates early at Daddy Drew's.

"His confederates have told me all about the murder of Judson, so that they are sure to be hanged, and one of them, Jack Thompson, is ready to confess and tell just how Claymore hired them to do the deed.

"Between Jack's confession and what I heard them say, we have got a complete case.

"If I was in Hank Low's place I'd give up farming on land where the water is covered with oil, and dig wells.

"I noticed the appearance of the water in the stream when I was talking with Low earlier in the night, and I knew that the place to dig for oil is near his house."

It was soon proved that Nick was entirely right.

The upper part of Low's farm was rich in oil.

The farmer acted more than honestly about it.

With the help of Folsom, who was greatly pleased to learn that the clergyman had not committed suicide, Low got the names and addresses of all who had put money into the scheme of which Judson had been president. And in the end nobody who had invested with the clergyman lost anything.

No attempt was made to get back the part of the farm that was sold, for the land wasn't worth the trouble.

Jack Thompson confessed, but that did not save him from severe punishment. He was put in prison for life, and Claymore and Hamilton were hanged.

"I can't help wishing," said Nick, "that Claymore's partner, Donnelson, had been around. I would have liked to send him up, too, but perhaps I shall come across him later."

THE END.

The great detective's hope was soon fulfilled. He came across Donnelson in a case which will be described in the next issue of this Weekly, No. 281, under the title: "Nick Carter's Hunt for a Treasure; or, A Fight for Life With a Mysterious Foe." There's a blind man in this story, who puzzled Nick at first. He'll puzzle you, too, boys. Look out for him.

FIFTY PRIZES

FIFTY PRIZES

There is a good chance for every boy in our new

Funny Story Contest

YOU ALL KNOW what rattling funny stories we printed in the contest that has just closed. It was a corking contest, and we are going to follow it with another of the same kind. You have just as good a chance in this contest as any other boy in America, whether you entered the other contest or not. We want

MORE FUNNY STORIES

Think of the funniest story of which you have ever heard, or the best joke. Write it out and send it to us—then look out for funny stories. We are going to publish in this contest some of the best side-splitters that ever came out of the joke factory. Remember the prizes we are offering. In this contest there are

FIFTY NEW PRIZES

FIVE FIRST PRIZES The five boys who send in the five best stories will each receive TEN BOOKS from this list. The list includes some of the best detective stories, tales of adventure, and most interesting boys' stories ever written.

TEN SECOND PRIZES The ten boys who send in the next best stories will each receive any FOUR BOOKS they may select in this list.

FIFTEEN THIRD PRIZES The fifteen boys who send us the next best stories will each receive any THREE BOOKS they may select in this list. The next twenty boys will receive any TWO BOOKS they may select in this list.

HERE ARE THE DIRECTIONS

This contest will close SEPTEMBER 1st. Remember, whether your story wins a prize or not, it stands a good chance of being published, together with your name.

To become a contestant for these prizes you must cut out the Prize Contest Coupon printed herewith, fill it out properly, and mail it to Nick Carter Weekly, care of Street & Smith, 238 William St., New York City, together with your story. No story will be considered that does not have this coupon accompanying it. Watch for the announcement of the prize winners in three weeks.

COUPON.

NICK CARTER WEEKLY PRIZE CONTEST No. 3.

Name.....
Street and Number.....
City or Town.....
State.....
Title of Story.....

- 1--The Boat Club.....By Oliver Optic
- 2--Cadet Kit Carey..By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 3--All Aboard.....By Oliver Optic
- 4--Lieutenant Carey's Luck,
By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 5--Now or Never.....By Oliver Optic
- 6--Captain Carey of the Gallant Seventh,
By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 7--Chased Through Norway.....By James Otis
- 8--Kit Carey's Protege,
By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 9--Try Again.....By Oliver Optic
- 10--Don Kirk, the Boy Cattle King,
By Gilbert Patten
- 11--From Tent to White House. (Boyhood and Life of President McKinley),
By Edward S. Ellis
- 12--Don Kirk's Mine.....By Gilbert Patten
- 13--Up the Ladder.....By Lieutenant Murray
- 14--The Young Colonists. A Story of Life and War in Africa.....G. A. Henty
- 15--Midshipman Merrill,
By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 16--The White King of Africa,
By William Murray Graydon
- 17--Ensign Merrill...By Lieut. Lionel Lounsberry
- 18--The Silver Ship.....By Leon Lewis
- 19--Jack Archer.....By G. A. Henty
- 33--Jud and Joe, Printers and Publishers,
By Gilbert Patten
- 34--The Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green,
By Cuthbert Bede, B. A.
- 35--In the Reign of Terror.....By G. A. Henty
- 36--In Barracks and Wigwam,
By William Murray Graydon
- 37--Commodore Junk...By George Manville Fenn
- 38--Gay Dashiell's Academy Days
By Arthur Sewall
- 39--With Boer and Britisher in the Transvaal,
By William Murray Graydon
- 40--Canoe and Campfire..By St. George Rathbone
- 41--Check 2134.....By Edward S. Ellis
- 42--The Young Acrobat...By Horatio Alger, Jr.
- 43--In Southern Seas.....By Frank H. Converse
- 44--The Golden Magnet..By George Manville Fenn
- 45--Jack Wheeler; A Western Story,
By Capt. David Southwick
- 46--Poor and Proud.....By Oliver Optic
- 47--Eric Dane.....By Matthew White, Jr.
- 48--Luke Bennett's Hide-Out,
By Capt. C. B. Ashley, U. S. Scout
- 49--The Mystery of a Diamond,
By Frank H. Converse
- 50--Dean Dunham.....By Horatio Alger, Jr.
- 51--Tom Tracy.....By Arthur Lee Putnam
(Horatio Alger, Jr.)
- 52--From Farm Boy to Senator,
By Horatio Alger, Jr.
- 53--The Adventures of a New York Telegraph
Boy.....By Arthur Lee Putnam
(Horatio Alger, Jr.)
- 54--Joe Nichols; or, Difficulties Overcome,
By Alfred Oldfellow
- 55--A Voyage to the Gold Coast,
By Frank H. Converse
- 56--Nature's Young Noblemen,
By Brooks McCormick
- 57--The Gold of Flat Top Mountain,
By Frank H. Converse
- 22--The Champdoce Mystery..By Emile Gaboriau
- 24--The Detective's Dilemma..By Emile Gaboriau
- 25--The Detective's Triumph..By Emile Gaboriau
- 26--File No. 113.....By Emile Gaboriau
- 27--The Steel Necklace..By Fortune Du Boisgobey
- 28--Under His Thumb...By Donald J. McKenzie
- 29--The Clique of Gold.....By Emile Gaboriau
- 30--The Bag of Diamonds,
By George Manville Fenn
- 31--The Red Lottery Ticket,
By Fortune Du Boisgobey
- 32--A Mysterious Case.....By K. F. Hill
- 227--From Clew to Climax.....By Will N. Harben
- 225--Tracked by Fate.....By Fergus Hume
- 223--Found Dead.....By Hero Strong
- 221--Other People's Money...By Emile Gaboriau
- 219--A Hidden Clew..By Ernest De Lancey Pierson
- 217--Baron Trigault's Vengeance,
By Emile Gaboriau
- 216--The Count's Millions.....By Emile Gaboriau
- 214--The Missing Cashier,
By Ernest De Lancey Pierson
- 212--A Mystery Still.....By Fortune Du Boisgobey
- 210--An Excellent Knave.....By J. F. Molloy
- 208--The Condemned Door,
By Fortune Du Boisgobey
- 206--The Portland Place Mystery,
By Ernest De Lancey Pierson
- 204--Hunted Down,
By Richard Ashton Wainwright

Say, boys, this new contest has made a great beginning. The editor dislocated his jaw laughing last week. He says his sides are sore, and he has lost two or three buttons from his vest. He is ready for more, however.

Prize winners in the last contest will be announced next week. Look out for them. Maybe you have won a prize.

Pat Rooney.

(By John D. McGuire, R. I.)

Pat Rooney was an Irishman who lived near my house. He was working one day in a pit with Mike Farrell. Pat began to tell Mike about his life.

At last Mike got tired of hearing Pat talking and he asked Pat:

"Say, Pat, how many tongues have you got?"

"Why," answered Pat, "I have three tongues."

"How do you make that out?" asked Mike.

"Why, to be sure, I have one in my mouth and two in my shoes," answered Pat.

One night Pat and Mike slept together. When they woke up Mike asked Pat, "Did you hear the thunder last night?"

"No, Mike; did it really thunder?" asked Pat.

"Yes," said Mike, "it thundered as if heaven and earth would come together."

"Why the deuce," said Pat, "didn't you wake me up, ye know that I can't sleep when it thunders?"

Another time Pat was sent to the post office after the letters. He was asked on his return:

"Well, Pat, what was there for me?"

"Two letters and a paper, sir."

"Well, hand them to me. What are you standing there for?"

"Indade, sir, and you didn't tell me to bring them, at all, at all."

"What did you go to the post office for?"

"Well, to be sure, you told me to go to the post office and see what was in your box, and haven't I done it, sir?"

So Pat had to go back to the post office again.

One day Pat got a Jew boy to say a speech.

"Tell us the story or poem about 'Excelsior,'" said one of the men who was with Pat. Then the boy began:

"Dose efening clouds was sedding fast,
As a young mans drough der fillage passed.
Shkating along 'mid shtorm and hail.
Mit dese vords tied py his goat dail,
Shoo Flies!

"Oh, don't go oudt such a nightd like dose!"
His mudder gried, 'you vill got vroz;

Dot Shack Vrost he vill nib your ear.'

He only answered mid a sneer:

'Shoo Flip!'

"'Come pack, come pack!' der oldt man saidt;

'Come here und eadt dis biece uv pread.'

He yust looked down und hofe a sigh,

'I vus a hunky boy mit a glass eye:

Shoo Strings!

"Higher undt higher dot young mans vent,

For der shtorms he didn't gare a cent.

He flipped de shnow off his nose und ear,

Und dese vords vas heardt so loudt und clear,

'Shoo Tacks!'

"In about a week (or maype more)

Der beebie heardt an awful roar,

Dot sounded loudt und var und vide,

Von vay up der moundain side:

Shoemaker!

"Two men vere oudt a-shooting shnipes,

Und vile dey shtopped to shmoke der bipes,

Und ven dey habbened to look aroundt,

Dey saw dot shticking in the ground,

Lalamazoo!"

So this finishes the adventures of Pat Rooney.

Bill Was Too Smart.

(By Hugh M. Haines, Pa.)

"My son Bill," said the old farmer, "was just too smart for anything. I had a big red bull, who used to git loose once in a while and lick everything in the State, an' Bill was ready to bet his last cent on that critter.

"One day when a circus procession was coming up the road Bill comes running from the barnyard an' says:

"'Dad, I'm goin' tolet that bull out.'

"'Fur why?' says I. "'Fur to see him hev fun with the elephant.'

"'Don't you do nuthin' of the kind. The elephant would break his back in a holy minit.'

"'Never, dad, never! Our bull will roar one roar, dive one dive, and he'll tumble that behemoth into the ditch an' then upset the band wagon. Dad, it's the chance of our life to see a heap of fun.'

"Waal, now," drawled the old man, "Bill said so much that I told him to go ahead. Mebbe that bull smelt them three elephants a mile away, fur when he was let out he was ready fur a row. He pawed and bellered, and worked his mad up, and when the elephants finally come along he selected the biggest of the three and made fur him. One of the circus men called out fur one of us to take our critter away, but we was lettin' him take keer of hisself.

"Jest then, with a beller and a rush, he was upon the elephant, but things didn't happen as Bill had planned them. Say, now, but that big beast met our bull head on an' knocked him flat, and then he got his trunk under him and flung him into a swamp and never even looked at him. We went down to see our bull, and he had tears in his eyes, a broken leg and one horn gone. I looks at Bill, and Bill looks at me, and bimeby I says:

" 'Bill, this critter cost me $40 in cash.'

" 'Don't say a word, dad,' he says, as he sits down, with a big sigh. 'I thought I was the smartest feller in this county, but I was foolin' myself. I'll work three months fur $15 a month and pay for the bull, and if I'm ever fool 'nuff to buck up ag'in another elephant, may somebody kill me with a crowbar.' "

A horse from a livery stable died soon after being returned, and the person who hired it was sued for damages. A witness was called—a long, lanky stable boy.

"How does the defendant usually ride?"

"Astraddle, sir."

"No, no," said the lawyer. "I mean, does he usually walk, or trot, or gallop?"

"Well," said the witness, "when he rides a walkin' horse, he walks; when he rides a trottin' horse, he trots; and, when he rides a gallopin' horse, he gallops; when —,"

The lawyer was now angry. "I want to know at what pace the defendant usually goes—fast or slow."

"Well," said the witness, "when his company rides fast, he rides fast; and when his company rides slow, he rides slow."

"Now, I want to know, sir," the lawyer said, very much exasperated, "how the defendant rides when he is alone."

"Well," said the witness, very slowly, and more meditatively than ever, "when he was alone I warn't there, so I don't know."

She Found It Out.

(By Alfred Lucas, N. J.)

She was lank and lean, and there was a look of suppressed curiosity in her eyes as they rested on the faces of her fellow passengers. Presently she nudged her companion.

"There comes that Litewite girl," she whispered; "the one that was married about a year ago. Can you remember her name? I can't."

"Why, yes, it was Jennie."

"Nonsense. I can't call her Jennie, can I? I mean her married name. It's on the tip of my tongue, too, but I can't get it."

"Let me see, I believe it begins with an S. Perhaps it is Smith?"

"Of course not, silly; I could remember that without trying. I say she looks as if she was pretty well off. Let's go over and sit beside her."

"But we don't know what to call her."

"Oh, leave that to me, I'll manage it—I've a plan that never fails. Why, how do you do? I'm so glad to see you!"

"Why, this is quite a surprise."

"Yes, isn't it? I've been wanting to come to see you for an age, but it is so far that I've kept putting it off. Let me see, what is your new address?"

"Oh, we are in the same place. Why, did you think we had moved?"

"Oh, almost everybody did this year."

"How is your husband? Well? By the way, what do you call him? There is so much talk now as to whether a wife should use her husband's Christian name or——"

"Oh, I always use his Christian name."

"Hum—very much better, I'm sure. And his mother—do you call——"

"I call her ma, just as my husband does."

"Do you know, I met an old acquaintance to-day and she had actually forgotten that I was married. Wasn't it horrid of her?"

"Oh, horrid! By the way, how do you spell your name? We had quite a controversy about it the other day."

A wave of color crept over the other woman's face.

"With two g's," she replied, in frigid tones, signaling the conductor to stop the 'bus as she spoke.

As she stumbled out, a shrill voice from the far corner piped out:

"Why, that was Mrs. Hogg, wasn't it? Her face was so red that I hardly knew her. I wonder why she got out here."

The Devil He.

(By Harry Ellinger, Pa.)

Highlanders have the habit, when talking their English, such as it is, of interjecting the personal pronoun, "he," where not required—such as "The king he has come," instead of "The king has come." Often, in consequence, a sentence or expression is rendered sufficiently ludicrous, as the sequel will show.

A gentleman says he has had the pleasure of listening to a clever man, the Rev. Mr. Bruce, of Edinburgh, and recently he began his discourse thus:

"My friends, you will find the subject of discourse this afternoon in the first epistle general of the Apostle Peter, chapter five and verse eight, in the words, 'The devil he goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.' Now, my friends, with your leave, we will divide the subject of our text to-day into four heads:

"Firstly, we shall endeavor to ascertain, Who the devil he was.

"Secondly, we shall inquire into his geographical position, namely, Where the devil he was, and where the devil he was going.

"Thirdly, and this is of a personal character, Who the devil he was seeking.

"And fourthly and lastly, we shall endeavor to solve a question which has never been solved yet. What the devil he was roaring about."

John's Revenge.

(By Harry Goodstein, Mass.)

Mr. Smarthead, the teacher, had been rough on John, and John wanted revenge.

The next day John came to school and the teacher noted a meaning smile on his face, and saw that he wanted revenge.

A little later the teacher went out for a moment and when he returned he saw a tack on his chair. But he saw through the thing and did not sit down again, but said:

"Boys, I am going out of the room for a moment and I want a boy to take my place at the desk while I am out."

Then turning to John he said:

"You may come here and take my place, but sit down on my chair and do not stir."

When he finished speaking the last words he grasped John by the shoulders and sat him down on the chair. The tack was made of steel, but the pants were made of wool, so, of course, the tack went through the pants.

Quack! Quack!

(By R. Jackson, Ohio.)

A quack doctor stood on his wagon at a street corner selling his cureall. A group of people gathered about him, and he undertook to teach them the anatomy of the throat.

"My dear friends," he began, "perhaps you don't know it, but there are two passages that go from the back of the mouth to your stomach. One is called the oesophagus, and the other the oesophagi. Now, the solid victuals go down the oesophagus and the liquids down the oesophagi. Over the top of the holes is a cover with a hinge in the middle, and when you swallow beefsteak the little door over the oesophagus flies open, and vice versa when you take a drink of coffee."

This proved too much for an old farmer who stood on the edge of the crowd. Shaking with laughter, he remarked in a loud voice:

"Gosh! but those doors must go flipper-flopper when you eat bread and milk."

A Mud Bath.

(By Ralph Bown, Canton, Ill.)

One Monday morning an Irishman was seen busily engaged in repairing a break in the fence, which was made by "Billy, the terror of the neighborhood," who was known to have eaten two shirts and a pair of pants from Mrs. McFadden's clothes line.

When Billy saw an opportunity to have fun he never let it slip by. As he was strolling about the yard (looking for trouble, of course) he happened to spy a large black Thomas cat belonging to Mrs. McFadden. This cat was an old enemy of Billy's. Tom, the cat, was standing just back of Pat. As soon as Billy saw the cat he let out a great big "Ba-a-h-a-a," and lowering his head, he let fly. Tom, who was watching for just such a play on Billy's part, skipped nimbly out of the way, of the approaching head. The result was that Billy missed the cat and got Pat square in the seat of the pants, and knocked him through the fence, and into a pool of muddy water, in the alley.

Pat pulled himself out as well as he could, and rubbing the injured spot a little he limped into the house. I am sorry to say that for the rest of the week Pat took his meals standing up.

A Few Morsels of Humor.

(By Robert J. Cross, Mich.)

WAITING FOR A BEARD.

A smooth-faced dude entered a barber shop and asked to be shaved. After carefully covering his face with lather the barber sat down and began to read the paper.

"I say, bahbah," began the dude, "what are you awaiting foh?"

"For your beard to grow so I can shave you," replied the heartless barber.

HE DIND'T TOUCH ONE.

"James," said Mr. Clapp to his young son, "did you eat those apples that your mother put in the icebox yesterday?"

"No, sir," replied James, "I did not touch one."

Then said his father:

"How is it that your mother found five cores in your room and only one apple left in the icebox?"

"That," said James, rushing for the door, "is the one I didn't touch."

PERHAPS A CREME DE CHICKEN.

"Waiter, are you sure that they put fresh eggs in this golden fizz?"

"Yas, sah!"

"Then how is it I find these feathers?"

"Doan know, sah, unless yo' got a cocktail by mistake."

The Youngest is the Oldest.

(By Aug. Woelfle, N. Y.)

Once there was a Dutchman and he had two dogs. The youngest was the largest. One day an Irishman came to the Dutchman's house and they began talking about the dogs.

"The smallest is the biggest," says the Dutchman.

"No, no," exclaims his wife. "My husband does not talk right. The youngest is the oldest."

The Hairy Potatoes.

(By F. A. Morville, Marquette, Mich.)

There was a friend of mine who was born and raised in the country. He had never been to town in his life, and so one day he stayed with me at my home.

When we got our dinner he asked me to go down-town with him, so I consented to go with him to show him the sights, and as we were passing a grocery store he saw some cocoanuts in the window. He stopped and gazed at them for a while and he said to me:

"How much do those potatoes with hair on cost?"
I laughed all day. Every time I think of him I laugh.

A New Kind of Cheese.

(By A. M. Erwin, La.)

It has not been many years since, that if one went into a village store and called for a box of axle grease, that there would be handed him a round wooden box of grease of a dirty grayish color.

Later on came the tin boxes with the bright golden grease which looked very much like cheese.

One of these is the cause of this story, the incident actually occurring in a town on the Arkansas River, about ninety miles above Little Rock.

An old negro came into the store one day and after making his necessary purchases was looking around the store when he saw the axle grease in the tin boxes.

It was something new to him and turning to the clerk, he said:

"Boss, what kind of cheese am dat?"

The clerk, seeing a chance for a good joke, replied:

"Well, Mose, that is a new kind of cheese, and it is very fine."

Mose picked up a box, looked at it closely and asked:

"What am it worth, Mr. John?"

Mr. John replied:

"Well, it is worth only ten cents, and if you want a box, Mose, I'll throw in some crackers with it."

The old darky took the "cheese" and the crackers and went out back of the store and sat down on a drygoods box to enjoy his lunch.

He didn't seem to enjoy it very well and made such awful faces that we who were watching just laughed and laughed till we could laugh no longer. But Mose kept faithfully at it, and finally finished his lunch. When he came back into the store we were all up in front trying to keep our faces straight. Mose came up to me and said:

"Marse Abe, does you like dat new cheese?"

"Why, certainly," I replied, "it is very fine."

Mose looked at the other boxes, twisted his tongue around in his mouth as if trying to get rid of the taste, and then said, very earnestly and solemnly:

"Boss, dat am de ransomest cheese dat I ever eat."

Two Hunting Stories.

(By Amos.)

A turkey hunter once crept up under a huge tree in the darkness of the night to wait for light enough to shoot the turkeys overhead. When it was light he noticed there were twelve turkeys roosting on a straight limb. He knew that his bullet could only get one turkey, so he took an extra bullet from his pouch and whittled in the shape of a wedge and dropped it in the muzzle of his rifle. Then, instead of shooting the turkeys he aimed at the limb and split it as the bullet passed through, and when the two sides came together again it caught the turkey's feet, and that is how he got twelve turkeys with one bullet.

My friend told a story about a hunter who fired nearly a score of times up into a tree at some strange animal, such as he had no recollection of ever having seen before, but his two companions with him tried in vain to get a sight of the strange animal. Finally it was discovered that on a hair from his eyebrow, which hung down within a half inch of the pupil of his eye, was an insect usually found grazing on the heads of people and that was what he was shooting at. When it was removed the strange animal disappeared.

An Evasive Answer.

(By H. Hunt, Mich.)

"Pat," said an Irish clergyman to his factotum, "I shall be very busy this afternoon, and if any one calls I do not wish to be disturbed."

"All right, sor. Will I say you're not at home?"

"No, Pat, that would be a lie."

"Ah, pwhat'll I say, yer riverence?"

"Oh, just put him off with an evasive answer."

At supper time Pat was asked if any one had called.

"Faix, there did," said he.

"And what did you tell him?"

"Sure and I gave him an evasive answer."

"How was that?" queried his reverence.

"He axed me wuz your honor in, an' I sez to him, sez I, 'Was your grandmother a hoot owl?'"

Three Were Enough.

(By S. Lingelbach, Wisconsin.)

An Irishman, in order to celebrate the advent of a new era, went out on a lark. He didn't get home till three o'clock in the morning, and was barely in the house before a nurse rushed up and uncovering a bunch of soft goods, showed him triplets. The Irishman looked up at the clock, which said three, then at the three of a kind in the nurse's arms and said:

"Oi'm not superstitious, but Oi thank Hiven thot Oi didn't come home at twilve."

RIDER AGENTS WANTED
One in each town to ride and exhibit a sample 1902 Bicycle.

1902 Models, $9 to $15
'01 & '00 Models, high grade, $7 to $11
500 Second-hand Wheels
all makes and models, good as new,
$3 to $8. Great Factory Clearing Sale at half factory cost. We ship to anyone on approval and ten days trial without a cent in advance.

EARN A BICYCLE distributing
1000 catalogues for us. Write at once for bargain list and our wonderful special offer to agents. Tires, equipment, sundries, all kinds, half regular prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 357 L.
CHICAGO, ILL.

$1 worth of Tricks & Make-ups, sent postpaid for 25 cents stamps or silver. A nice Moustache or full Beard, Irish or Side Whiskers, any color, bottle Spirit Gum to stick them on. Box of Burnt Cork to blacken up. Ink, Rubber Mouth, big teeth, secret & apparatus for performing the great vanishing half-dollar trick. This big offer is to get your address to send my large file, cat'g of plays, wigs, tricks & agts. latest novelties. Mention paper you saw this in and I will also put in a Heavy GOLD plate finger Ring FREE, send size. Address Chas. Marshall, Mfr., Lockport, N.Y.

Amateur Detective Work.

Boys, in reading one of the Nick Carter stories did you ever try to think ahead and guess who was the criminal in the case?

Each of the readers has a chance to find out how good a detective he is.

He has the facts of the case laid before him just as Nick Carter himself has.

Of course, he has not got Nick's experience or wonderful detective instinct. Still, he can prove whether or not he is a good detective by trying to decide in his own mind what the solution of the mystery is before he has read to the end of the story. The earlier in the story he is able to make his guess and the more accurate it is, the better detective he is.

We want to see what sort of detectives the readers of the NICK CARTER WEEKLY are.

We want one and all of you to write to us, telling us whether you were able to solve the mystery that Nick Carter had to solve before reading to the end of any of the stories.

Tell us how far you read before you arrived at your decision, and just what points guided you in making your decision. Your letters will be printed in this column.

Here are three good letters, boys. Three of the best out of the pile of letters we've been getting.

The first is from A. M. Erwin, who has just entered the funny story contest. His story was a rattling good one, and will be printed shortly. We wish him success in all he undertakes.

He comes from that lively old French-American town, New Orleans, and he's a credit to it.

Messrs. Street & Smith—

Gentlemen: I have been a reader of Nick Carter ever since it first came out and I think it the best book of its kind published. I took great interest in the contests last summer and winter and wished that I could have been in them, but I was barred by lack of time. When I first commenced reading Nick Carter I was a slim youngster weighing ninety-five pounds.

Now at twenty-four, I weigh 152 pounds and hold some very good records.

I enclose a story which I hope will win a second prize. Success to you, your publications and their authors. I mean continued success, as they are a success already. I will read them as long as I can get them.

Hoping my story takes a prize, I remain,

Yours truly,

New Orleans.

A. M. ERWIN.

Thank you for your good wishes. Your story is entered in the contest.

Here's a letter from another part of the country. It's a good big hop, skip and a jump from sunny Louisiana to Minnesota. But we can make it.

Hear what the boy from the Northwest has to say for himself.

He's got the makings of a fine detective in him, and he's all right, anyway.

Dear Sir: I have read a number of Nick Carter Weeklies. I always think ahead. In "Nick Carter's Ocean Chase" I spotted Palog first thing for the thief, because he was restless and uneasy.

I was reading on the second page, and I said to myself, "Palog is the thief."

In the "Mine Under the Grand Duke's Palace," I knew the girl was the leader of the gang, because the leaders do the plotting.

In "Nick Carter and the Guilty Governor," I had suspicions of the Governor as soon as Chick had got those letters, and my suspicions grew greater when I read Nick's talk with the Governor.

I always solve the mystery before reading much of the story.

Yours truly,

Mariette, Minn.

FRANK PEBLY.

Good work, Frank.

Get ready for another trip. This time we're going East to Boston.

Nick Carter has worked on many cases there.

There are some rattling good amateur detectives in that town. Here's a letter from one of them:

Editor of Nick Carter Weekly—

Dear Sir: What a corking story "Nick Carter and the Professor" is!

It offers the amateur detective a fine chance to show his ingenuity. I must say that I was suspicious of Professor Drummond from the first.

There was something queer about the man. He gave me a sort of creepy feeling when he talked to Nick. He lived in a queer way—the way a crank or a crook would live.

About the middle of the story I had my suspicions.

A little further on I became more certain.

I think Nick never showed his ability to better advantage than in that story.

Three hearty cheers for Nick and the rest of the Carters.

Yours for success,

Boston, Mass.

DONALD MCKENZIE.

Good work, Donald. You show good judgment. Write again.

NICK CARTER WEEKLY.

(LARGE SIZE.)

The Best Detective Stories in the World.

- 249—Nick Carter Investigating a Leak; or, One Page Missing.
- 250—Nick Carter's Double Clew; or, The Fatal Resemblance.
- 251—Nick Carter and "The Brown Robin"; or, The Unknown Letter Writer.
- 252—Nick Carter Tracking a Traitor; or, Night Work in a Country Town.
- 253—Nick Carter's Tunnel Mystery; or, Lost: $200,000 in Gold.
- 254—Nick Carter's Queer Murder Case; or, Under a Terrible Suspicion.
- 255—Nick Carter Challenged; or, Fighting a Powerful Enemy.
- 256—Nick Carter and Arizona Jake; or, The Big Westerner's Part in the Cooper Suicide.
- 257—Nick Carter in the Council of the Reds; or, The Plot of the Anarchists.
- 258—Nick Carter and the Secret of the Tin Box; or, The Man Who Stole His Name.
- 259—Nick Carter's Fire Trail; or, Thwarting a Villain's Plot.
- 260—Nick Carter on the Track of the Freight Thieves; or, The Boldest Gang in New York.
- 261—Nick Carter on the Track of a Gentleman Burglar; or, Robbing a Thief.
- 262—Nick Carter Attacked; or, The Desperate Plot on the Detective's Life.
- 263—Nick Carter on the Trail of the River Pirates; or, The Dangerous Work on the River Front.
- 264—Nick Carter and the King of the Tramp Thieves; or, Patsy's Lone Hand Against the Hoboes.
- 265—Nick Carter and the Man in the Cask; or, Patsy's Terrible Predicament.
- 266—Nick Carter and the Shoplifters; or, The Automobile Clew.
- 267—Nick Carter's Ocean Chase; or, The Missing Crown Diamond.
- 268—Nick Carter and the Broken Dagger; or, The Black Man from Borneo.
- 269—Nick Carter's Advertisement; or, A New Way to Catch a Criminal.
- 270—Nick Carter and the Nihilists; or, The Mine Under the Grand Duke's Palace.
- 271—Nick Carter in the Convict Gang; or, Ida Jones to the Rescue.
- 272—Nick Carter and the Guilty Governor; or, The American Detective and the Russian Officer.
- 273—Nick Carter in Canada; or, Showing the Way to a Treacherous Guide.
- 274—Nick Carter and the Smugglers; or, Thief-Catching on the Border.
- 275—Nick Carter's Enemy; or, Bringing a Murderer to the Gallows.
- 276—Nick Carter's Land Office; or, Outwitting a Clever Swindler.
- 277—Nick Carter and the Professor; or, Solving a Scientific Problem.
- 278—Nick Carter as a Mill Hand; or, The Fall River Murder Mystery Revealed.
- 279—Nick Carter and the Kidnaped Heiress; or, The Recovery of a Great Ransom.
- 280—Nick Carter Strikes Oil; or, Uncovering More Than a Murderer.
- 281—Nick Carter's Hunt for a Treasure; or, A Fight for Life with a Mysterious Foe.

All of the above numbers always on hand. If you cannot get them from your newsdealer, five cents a copy will bring them to you by mail, postpaid.

STREET & SMITH, PUBLISHERS, 238 William St., New York.

McGOVERN CROSS-COUNTERS WITH HIS RIGHT.

THERE can be no question about the advantage of being able to box well. When called upon to defend yourself you are always ready and the manly art of boxing if practiced as set forth in the pages of the book entitled "The Art of Boxing and Self Defense" will bring the muscles into play and transform a weak man into a noble specimen of his race. . . .

The Art of Boxing^{and} Self Defense

By PROF. DONOVAN

The only authentic work on Boxing now on the market.

DIAMOND
HAND BOOK
No. 9

THE CONTENTS AND ILLUSTRATIONS WILL INTEREST THE MOST INDIFFERENT PERSON.

DIAMOND
HAND BOOK
No. 9

IT is profusely illustrated with 37 elegant half-tone cuts, showing the different positions and blows. The originals of these illustrations are such noted pugilists as James Jeffries, Robert Fitzsimmons, James J. Corbett, Terry McGovern, Young Corbett, and all the heavy and light-weight fighters who have ever held the championship of their class.

The book is printed on good paper, clear, sharp type and bound in attractive illuminated cover.

PRICE 10 CENTS
ALL NEWSDEALERS

If sent by mail, 3 cents additional for postage.

STREET & SMITH PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK

YOUNG CORBETT GETS IN A STRAIGHT LEFT ON McGOVERN'S STOMACH.